30 September 1986

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that Her Excellency the Governor General will arrive at the Main Entrance of the Parliament Buildings at 2:45 p.m. on Wednesday, the 1st day of October, 1986.

When it has been signified that all is in readiness, Her Excellency will proceed to the Chamber of the Senate to formally open the Second Session of the Thirty-Third Parliament of Canada.

Yours sincerely,
Léopold H. Amyot
Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

MINISTER OF YOUTH AFFAIRS AND SPORTS, REPUBLIC OF INDONESIA

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I call your attention to the presence in our gallery of His Excellency Abdul Gafur, Minister of Youth Affairs and Sports of the Republic of Indonesia.

We welcome warmly this high official of a country which is a very good friend of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, 1st October, 1986, at eleven thirty o'clock in the forenoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the motion is put, I believe we should give the house leader and the deputy leader an opportunity to answer allegations of possible procedural heresy in the way that we are proceeding this week. For example, as I understood it, Parliament was prorogued until October 1. Citation 194 of Beauchesne's says—

Hon. Jacques Flynn: We were not prorogued. We had adjourned until September 16.

Senator Frith: What is the difference? Parliament was prorogued after the adjournment.

An Hon. Senator: That's right.

Senator Frith: None of us is surprised that Senator Flynn has overruled the Governor General's prorogation. Citation 194 of Beauchesne's says:

The Senate and Commons cannot open a session by their own authority. It is by the act of the Crown alone that they can be assembled, but the Governor General's power is restrained within certain limits. The B.N.A. Act, s. 20, declares that there cannot be an interval of twelve months between two sessions, which is emphasized by the practice of providing money for the Public Service by annual enactments. The Governor General's authority is only theoretical, as Parliament is always summoned on the advice of the Prime Minister. The opening of the session may, however, be deferred by Proclamation from the day to which it stands summoned to any further day, but it cannot be called for an earlier date.

An Hon. Senator: So we are not here!

Senator Frith: I am sure that the Deputy Leader of the Government has an explanation for the fact that rather than our being present here today and, in accordance with the appendix to our rules, waiting for the House of Commons to elect a Speaker, and, following which, having Her Excellency the Governor General appear and read the Speech from the Throne, on this occasion we will be sitting twice prior to the formal opening, which is not in accord with our usual practice.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank the Deputy Leader of the Opposition for providing me with an opportunity to get on the record.

As to the reasoning and rationale behind the calling of Parliament today, while it is true that citation 194 of Beauchesne's as quoted by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has been quoted accurately, the officials in both the other place and here in researching the matter could find nothing to substantiate that particular statement, other than the fact that it is written in Beauchesne's.

Senator Frith: Which has been known to be enough.

Senator Doody: Which has been known to be argued, quarrelled over and questioned from time to time by honourable senators and others. However, the researchers were successful in finding a reference in the twentieth edition of Erskine May which is more fitting to the occasion.

Senator Frith: More profitable in any event!

Senator Doody: The paragraph is entitled "Meeting of Parliament accelerated during prorogation." It reads:

Just as the Queen is empowered to postpone the meeting of Parliament, so authority is vested in her to accelerate its meeting.

(1) Generally. When Parliament stands prorogued to a certain day, the Queen may, by the Meeting of Parliament Act 1797 as amended by the Meeting of Parliament Act 1870 and section 34 of the Parliament (Elections and Meeting) Act 1943, issue a proclamation, giving notice of her intention that Parliament shall meet for the dispatch of business on any day after the date of the proclamation; and Parliament then stands prorogued to that day, notwithstanding the previous prorogation.

Erskine May goes on to cite several occasions when this has occurred, —Parliament was assembled in September 1799; and again on 12 December 1854 Parliament then standing prorogued to the 14th; and in 1857 in consequence of the suspension of the Bank Act of 1844, a proclamation was issued on 16 November assembling Parliament on 3 December. In 1900 the new Parliament which had been prorogued from 1 November, the day for which it had been summoned, to 10 December was summoned to meet for the dispatch of business on 3 December by a proclamation dated 26 November. In 1921 Parliament, which had been prorogued until 30 January 1922, was summoned to meet on 14 December by a proclamation dated 7 December.

So precedent was found in Westminster for the calling of Parliament prior to the date mentioned in the prorogation, and the citation of Erskine May covers it adequately.

Senator Frith: I think it is important that we have that on the record. Just to complete the record, perhaps the deputy leader could say officially for the record whether there has been such a proclamation in this case.

Senator Doody: Indeed there has.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, there is more to this peculiar little story than has been laid before the Senate. We might as well stop looking back 100 years or more for precedents. The reason we are here is because there is a precedent-setting procedure taking place in the other place today—that of having the members elect their Speaker. Of course, when Parliament is summoned for a prorogation, it is not only the House of Commons that is summoned; both houses of Parliament are summoned.

Senator Argue: All members of Parliament!

Senator Olson: Yes. I hope that this fact puts an end to the problem I have been having with some of my colleagues in this chamber, arising from the question as to whether or not we are members of Parliament.

Senator Argue: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: Some of my colleagues have accepted this fact for a long time. My own business cards are printed with "P.C., M.P." after my name. Of course, the "P.C." stands for "Privy Councillor," not "Progressive Conservative." I invite all other members to have their business cards printed accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11.30 a.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, October 1, 1986

The Senate met at 11.30 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

NEW SENATOR

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk has received a certificate from the Registrar General of Canada showing that Norman K. Atkins has been summoned to the Senate.

INTRODUCTION

The Hon. the Speaker having informed the Senate that there was a senator without, waiting to be introduced:

The following honourable senator was introduced; presented Her Majesty's writ of summons; took the oath prescribed by law, which was administered by the Clerk; and was seated.

Hon. Norman K. Atkins, of Markham, Ontario, introduced between Hon. Lowell Murray, P.C., and Hon. Finlay MacDonald.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the honourable senator named above had made and subscribed the declaration of qualification required by the Constitution Act, 1867, in the presence of the Clerk of the Senate, the Commissioner appointed to receive and witness the said declaration.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That the Senate do now adjourn until two thirty o'clock this afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until 2.30 p.m.

SECOND SITTING

The Senate met at 2.30 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

The Hon. the Speaker: As there is no business before the Senate, is it your pleasure, honourable senators, that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to await the arrival of Her Excellency the Governor General?

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 2.45 p.m., Her Excellency the Governor General having come and being seated upon the Throne—

The Hon. the Speaker said:

Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod,

You will proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that it is the pleasure of Her Excellency the Governor General that they attend her immediately in the Senate Chamber.

The House of Commons being come,

Their Speaker, the Hon. John A. Fraser, P.C., said:

May it please Your Excellency,

The House of Commons has elected me their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me.

If, in the performance of those duties, I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me and not to the Commons, whose servant I am.

The Hon. the Speaker of the Senate answered:

Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by Her Excellency the Governor General to assure you that your words and actions will constantly receive from her the most favourable construction.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Her Excellency the Governor General was then pleased to open the Second Session of the Thirty-third Parliament with the following speech:

Ladies and gentlemen, Honourable Members of the Senate,

Ladies and gentlemen, Members of the House of Commons:

It is with pleasure that I welcome you to the Second Session of the Thirty-third Parliament of Canada and express to you, on behalf of all our fellow-Canadians, my appreciation and gratitude for the work which you do here. It is you, above all others, who make our Parliamentary system work, and you who are responsible for ensuring the smooth operation of an institution which is essential to the welfare of Canadians and the unimpeded enjoyment of our freedoms.

Expo '86 has been a focus of international attention that has brought pride and joy to millions of Canadians. The success of British Columbia's world exposition strikingly demonstrates the creative skills of our people.

I have had the honour of presenting my respects, and yours, to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth on the occasion of her sixtieth birthday. At this time I conveyed to her Canada's feelings of loyalty. The warm affection accorded their Royal Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Wales — so evident during their visit to Expo '86 — again reminds us of the vitality of the monarchy and its enduring contribution to Canadian life. I have also had the opportunity to be present at the marriage of Their Royal Highnesses, the Duke and Duchess of York, and to receive here the visit of Her Majesty the Queen Mother, who once again charmed us with her intelligence and her amazing vitality. You may rest assured that I have, on these memorable occasions, given renewed expression to the respect which we all feel.

Two years ago, my government received a national mandate — a mandate for reform. It was a mandate that summoned Canada to the tasks of national reconciliation, economic renewal, social justice, and to a constructive internationalism. Today, my Ministers believe these goals are within reach.

We live today in a world of increasing uncertainty and interdependence. We live in a world where unforeseen events, both at home and abroad, demand flexibility and adaptiveness.

Although my government will remain sensitive to changing circumstances, it is determined to pursue these national objectives in the confidence that their fulfillment will bring lasting benefit to all Canadians.

Canadian agriculture is a vital part of our national economy. Aware of the present difficulties, my government will work in close consultation with provincial governments and farm organizations to help alleviate personal hardship in our farm communities.

The government has already taken special steps to lower farm input costs, improve stabilization programs, and help farmers in financial difficulty.

In the past, regrettably, agriculture has not been a priority in international trade negotiations. My government placed this issue on the agenda of the Economic Summit in Tokyo, and helped secure unanimous agreement to address subsidies in the new round of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations.

In meeting its commitment to Canadian agriculture, my government will spare no effort in seeking to protect the interests of Canada's farming community in the face of unfair pricing and subsidy practices conducted beyond our borders.

My government has acted to enhance the effective operation of Canada's energy industry, by negotiating the Western, the Atlantic, and the Nova Scotia accords and by taking other strong measures to support activity in a period of depressed world prices. Close cooperation with the producing provinces and the energy industry is a foremost objective of my Ministers as efforts continue to sustain Canada's energy prospects through this difficult period. These efforts are consistent with the true meaning and spirit of national unity.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Despite current difficulties, encouraging progress has been made towards renewing and strengthening the national economy. Unemployment is at its lowest level in over four years. Average incomes of Canadian families rose in real terms in 1985 for the first time in five years. The federal deficit has declined for the first time in six years. The prime rate is the lowest it has been in eight years. And government program spending has significantly declined for the first time in forty years. These economic indicators are encouraging.

Our efforts are meeting with encouraging success. The challenge now is to forge ahead. My government will do so by remaining true to the course set in the past two years. My government will continue its policy of prudent fiscal and financial management and will seek practical ways to encourage self-reliance and provide individual Canadians the incentive and opportunity to achieve greater security and well-being for themselves and for their families.

I. National Reconciliation

My government's commitment to national reconciliation invites all Canadians to participate fully and actively in the development of their country.

The Canadian Charter of Rights and the Constitution remain incomplete without the assent of Quebec. My Ministers have begun consultations with the provinces on this important subject. Should there appear reasonable prospects for agreement, formal negotiations will proceed in the expectation that Quebec will take its rightful place as a full partner in the Canadian Constitution.

The question of aboriginal rights is still on the constitutional agenda as a result of the Accord signed with the provinces in 1983. Pursuant to that agreement, a First Ministers Conference on aboriginal constitutional affairs will be convened. This will be the third and last such conference provided for in the 1983 Accord. In cooperation with the provinces, my government will exert every possible effort to bring these discussions to a successful conclusion.

Official bilingualism is an indispensable feature of our national character. Seventeen years after its enactment, Canada's Official Languages Act now needs to be revised. Appropriate legislation will be introduced in this Session to ensure, as well, that this Act conforms with the Canadian Charter of Rights.

My Ministers will propose amendments concerning the objectives and powers of the National Capital Commission. It is their intent to give greater expression and meaning to our national symbols.

Canada's National Parks represent a heritage of great importance to the present and future generations. My government will ask Parliament to approve major reforms to the National Parks Act for the first time since the original Act was passed, over five decades ago.

The preservation of historic properties is important to fostering a sense of history and national identity among Canadians. The government of Canada, as the largest owner of heritage sites and properties in the country, will assume a leadership role in their restoration and preservation.

II. Economic Renewal

Canada's program of economic renewal has as its goal the building of a national economy equipped to compete in an environment of intense global competition, changing markets, and new technologies. Economic renewal will be furthered by continued progress in restoring health to our public finances, by trade initiatives and by tax reform.

My government has committed itself to four principles in its quest to restore fiscal health to Canada. First, to reduce the growth in the national debt to less than the growth in the economy by the end of this decade. Second, to achieve continuing, sizeable, year-over-year reductions in the deficit. Third, to ensure substantial annual declines in the government's financial requirements. And fourth, to ensure that the greater part of this progress is secured through effective expenditure restraint.

Success in this quest will foster a climate of investor and consumer confidence that will continue to support lower inflation, lower interest rates, higher growth and more job opportunities for Canadians.

If Canada is to achieve an enduring economic recovery, government must also ensure that our country's interests are secured and enhanced in the international sphere.

Nearly one third of our economy depends on international markets. Our future is trade. That is why my government is seeking to open and secure new markets for Canada everywhere in the world. These efforts include bilateral talks with the United States and multilateral negotiations under the auspices of the GATT.

My government intends to improve Canada's status as a trading nation among our major partners. Particular emphasis will be placed upon trade with Japan and other Pacific Rim countries.

Trade promotion, however vigorous, cannot succeed if world markets important to Canadian exporters are threatened by increased protectionism.

Such pressures emphasize the importance of my government's pursuit of a mutually advantageous trade agreement with the United States. These talks are being accompanied by extensive consultations with the provinces, business and labour. Successful negotiations will strengthen both our economy and our capacity to reinforce our culture, our sovereignty, our commitment to regional development and the fundamental purposes of Canadian social policy.

Progress has already been made towards my government's objective of comprehensive tax reform. We have begun to restructure the corporate tax system. Equity in the personal income field has been enhanced through the introduction of the minimum tax. A refundable Sales Tax Credit has been introduced. Opportunities for tax avoidance have been curtailed.

In my government's further consideration of tax reform, fairness will be a guiding principle. The objectives of reform will be to lower tax rates and to reduce reliance upon personal income tax by improving the revenue balance between personal income and other taxes. A simpler and more comprehensible tax system would also be welcomed by all Canadians.

During this session, you will be asked to consider new initiatives to strengthen the competitiveness of the private sector.

To help remove obstacles to economic growth, my Ministers will continue to reduce the burden of paperwork and regulation, to advance the process of privatization of Crown Corporations, and to press for the removal of barriers to interprovincial trade.

My Ministers will introduce programs to promote small business and entrepreneurial values. Included will be measures to improve procurement procedures, to strengthen the unsolicited proposals program for small companies and entrepreneurs, to increase technology transfer from government laboratories, and to develop new initiatives to promote entrepreneurship among youth.

My government will again be placing before Parliament measures to give Canadians a more efficient, competitive and safe transport system by relieving the burden of unnecessary regulations on the transportation sector.

My government will propose a new regulatory framework for the financial services industry that will promote competition, efficiency, and international competitiveness, while strengthening consumer protection.

For many years, successive governments have sought to provide measures intended to promote regional development. Their efforts have not been as effective as hoped. Regional disparity remains an unacceptable reality of Canadian life. Our experience has shown that spending more money, by itself, has not solved the problem.

It is time to consider new approaches, to examine how our considerable and growing support for Canada's regions can be used more efficiently, more effectively and with greater sensitivity to local conditions and opportunities. In renewing their efforts to come to grips with this longstanding problem, my Ministers are convinced many positive proposals for new policy initiatives will come from those who live and work in the regions concerned.

Building on the human and natural resource strengths of the regions, a renewed cooperative effort will lead to a new development agenda. Special emphasis will be given to diversifying the economic base of Western Canada.

As a first step in achieving improved results from this sustained national approach, an Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency will be constituted to facilitate and coordinate all federal development initiatives in the area. This agency will make fuller use of the expertise available in the Atlantic region and invite the maximum participation of other governments and organizations in the area.

My government is concerned about the increasing concentration of corporations, particularly where takeovers serve to increase corporate size without creating new jobs or stimulating economic growth in Canada. Some aspects of this essentially non-productive activity will be examined and considered by Members of this House.

The importance of the fishing industry to Canada is fundamental. To provide increased safety for our fishermen and to protect their material investments, my government will place special emphasis on improving the management of small craft harbours in all fishing areas.

The forest sector is Canada's largest net export earner. My Ministers have substantially increased funding for forestry renewal. The government will continue to work in close partnership with the provinces, industry, and private woodlot owners to ensure that Canada's rich forest heritage continues as a vital source of wealth and jobs for future generations.

Measures will be introduced to strengthen Canada's cooperatives and to give recognition to their role in community development.

My government is deeply committed to supporting, with the provinces, a system of post-secondary education based on excellence and equality of opportunity. To help meet the challenges facing higher education, my government will propose a national forum on post-secondary education, to be held early next year.

My Ministers have begun to forge a partnership with the provinces, with the scientific and educational communities, and with business and labour in an effort to stimulate increased technological development in Canada. To assist and encourage cooperation between the universities and private sector in research and development, my government has announced an initiative that could provide a billion dollars in new funding for scientific research over the next five years.

My government will build upon this partnership by introducing a new four-point program to ensure that support for science, technology and education is more clearly focused in the national interest.

First, my government will appoint a National Advisory Board for Industrial Technology, chaired by the Prime Minister and composed of some of Canada's leading industrialists and scientists. This committee will assess national science and technology goals and policies, and their application to Canada's economy. Second, in full cooperation with the provinces, my government will seek to achieve high standards of excellence in education, technology development, and innovation. Third, it will introduce a new Federal Science and Technology Strategy, building on the initiatives undertaken to date. The strategy will introduce the necessary reforms within the federal administration to encourage Canada's international competitiveness. Fourth, my government will convene a National Conference on Technology and Innovation to assist Canada to define new technology goals.

My government's commitment to high technology as a motive force in Canada's economic growth will be expressed in legislation to establish a Canadian space agency. International cooperation in the peaceful use of space is essential to the development of key technologies. Working in cooperation with industry, universities and provinces, the new agency will help to ensure that the benefits of Canada's role in space will be shared by all Canadians.

III. Constructive Internationalism

The people of Canada maintain a deep interest in their country's role in the world. As Honourable Members of the Special Joint Committee of this Parliament know, Canadians seek a confident, constructive, active internationalism that reflects our hopes for the world as well as our own vital national interests.

From my own travels, and those of my Ministers, I can attest that other countries, large and small, look to Canada to play a vital role in the international community. Over the past year, I have travelled to Italy and the Vatican, while the Prime Minister has represented my government at the Commonwealth Conference, at the 40th Anniversary of the United Nations, the Francophone Summit, the Tokyo Summit, and in visits to France, Japan, China, South Korea, and the United States.

Our support for the multilateral institutions and agencies of which we are members remains the cornerstone of our foreign policy.

With Her Majesty the Queen as its head and unifying presence, the Commonwealth brings together countries of the North and South in support of common ideals and aspirations. The Commonwealth is central to Canada's efforts to promote, through concerted international action, a process of political dialogue in South Africa aimed at establishing representative government. My government will continue this effort, through the Commonwealth and the United Nations, until apartheid is abolished.

The world is aware how spontaneously the Canadian people rallied to the challenge of African famine and relief, demonstrating a concern and compassion so much a part of the national character. As Canadians, we will be called upon to respond to other challenges in the Third World. In reaffirming our commitments, it will be our purpose to find new partners in the ongoing efforts to pursue opportunities for increased development.

No task is more important to Canadians than preserving world peace and security.

My government is encouraged by the prospects for renewed dialogue between the leaders of the United States and the Soviet Union. We share the hope of other nations of the world that progress towards these talks will be sustained and appreciable.

Arms control and disarmament are essential elements of Canadian policy. We are in the forefront of multilateral discussions concerning conventional arms control and confidence-building in Europe. In the nuclear field, both the verification of existing agreements and the conclusion of new accords are vital elements in Canada's efforts. As a further step towards these objectives, my government will host this month an international symposium that will explore means of improving verification techniques.

My government recognizes that security is the surest safeguard of liberty. Accordingly, my government has taken steps to modernize and renew the strength of our Armed Forces and increase our NATO contingent in Western Europe.

The government asserts complete sovereignty over the Canadian Arctic and recognizes that sovereignty requires a vigorous national presence. My government has drawn straight baselines around the perimeter of the Arctic archipelago to preserve Canadian sovereignty over the land, sea, and ice of the Canadian Arctic. Canada will construct one of the most powerful icebreakers in the world to enhance our sovereign rights and to contribute to the development of the North. Other measures have been taken or will be initiated to support this vital national purpose, including more research on polar conditions, defence training exercises in the Arctic, and the establishment of a National Park at Ellesmere Island.

IV. Social Justice

A dynamic and changing society poses new challenges for social policy. Existing programs are not always wholly successful in meeting their objectives. They must be reviewed to ensure they are appropriate to today's circumstances and they must be strengthened where necessary. At the same time, new circumstances require the development of new programs.

My Ministers are well aware that social policy concerns are more satisfactorily met in a strong and growing economy that, in turn, requires steady progress in restoring fiscal health to our nation's finances. But fiscal responsibility is fully compatible with social responsibility.

My government will continue to enlist the support of all in pursuit of the common goal: a modern, tolerant, and caring nation in which its citizens are secure and prosperous. Canadians would want their governments to give the highest priority in social policy to those who are in greatest need. As well, Canadians expect to enjoy the highest quality in health care and other social benefits that have become fundamental to our national quality of life.

My government is resolved to defend and strengthen the institution of the Canadian family. Only now is our society beginning its effort to adjust to the evolving changes in family relationships and responsibilities, particularly concerning working parents.

My government recognizes that adequate, quality child care must become available. Following the report of your committee, my government will initiate discussions with the provinces, business and labour with a view to implementing a concerted approach to child care.

As a national priority, we must continue to remove the barriers that have prevented women from participating freely and equitably in the mainstream of Canadian society. My government regards the recent significant increase in appointments of women to the highest levels of the public service and to federal boards and commissions as only a first step towards full equality. My Ministers hope and expect the private sector will regard this progress as an example to follow.

In its desire to further the advancement of women in government, my Ministers will continue their efforts to correct inequitable wage rates in the public service.

My government will take effective action against child sexual abuse, violent forms of pornography involving women and children, child prostitution, and the grave and growing threat posed by the traffic in illegal drugs.

A national drug strategy and a comprehensive program dealing with impaired drivers will be brought forward to support the prevention of drug and alcohol abuse. My government will continue to provide domestic and international leadership in controlling drug abuse in amateur sport.

Reforms to the Criminal Code will be continued during this session of Parliament, reflecting the importance Canadians attach to such values as respect for the law and the protection of innocent citizens.

Measures will also be put before you designed to protect and assist victims of criminal violence. Further action will be proposed to assist in finding missing children.

Canadians are becoming increasingly aware of the suffering of battered women. This intolerable affront to human dignity and personal security compels my government's commitment to work with the provinces to implement on an urgent basis the most effective means and methods of action.

After a decade of debate, an historic agreement with the provinces has been reached that will improve benefits under the Canada Pension Plan, beginning on January 1, 1987. It will also put the plan on a sound financial footing for the future.

The federal Pension Benefits Standards Act, which sets standards that employer-sponsored pension plans must meet, has also been completely revised. The changes introduced will be of fundamental significance for wage earners, especially women in the labour force, and for the spouses of pension plan members.

The introduction of the new Canadian Jobs Strategy, which for the first time sets targets for women's participation, has helped women, particularly immigrant women, and the unemployed in their search for lasting and productive employment.

My government is encouraged by the decline in youth unemployment. However, much remains to be done. My Ministers are committed to federal-provincial and private sector cooperative action that will enhance job opportunities and encourage greater participation and involvement of young Canadians in productive and challenging initiatives.

Canadians recognize the courage and talent of our disabled citizens. Inspired by the example of Rick Hansen, we are made more aware of the potential for new directions and initiatives to aid the disabled.

My government will work with the provinces, the private sector and voluntary organizations to develop measures to ensure that Canadians have access to the literacy skills that are the prerequisites for participation in an advanced economy.

Ongoing improvements have also been made in assuring greater income security for the elderly. All widows and widowers aged 60 to 64 are now eligible to receive Spouses' Allowance Benefits. A new program of Older Worker Adjustment is also being negotiated with the provinces. The government will introduce legislation to increase tax assistance for retirement savings through Registered Retirement Savings Plans. The object will be to make access to tax assistance fairer between employees and the self-employed, and to increase the flexibility of options for the use of Registered Retirement Savings Plan savings by senior citizens.

In a spirit of deep respect and appreciation, my government will continue to address the needs of Canada's veterans. The Veterans Independence Program will be broadened to allow a greater number of First World War veterans to qualify immediately for the benefits designed to enable them to remain independent in their own homes rather than be compelled to accept institutional care. New legislation will also be introduced to streamline the pension process to provide faster, more efficient service to veterans.

In acknowledging the tens of thousands of Canadians who serve their communities and country as volunteers, my Ministers will propose further support to encourage the growth of voluntarism in our society.

Canada's amateur athletes instill pride in our country and achieve excellence in international competition. My government renews its commitment to the increased participation of young Canadian men and women in a wide variety of athletic endeavours, including the 1988 Winter Olympics that Canada will host in Calgary.

It is imperative that Canada's multicultural and multiracial reality be integral to all facets of our national life to reflect the vital and distinctive nature of Canadian society.

To that end, my government will: encourage the entrepreneurial spirit that characterizes our many minority communities and that contributes so essentially to Canada's economic development; extend recognition to minority community organizations in our society and increase equitable participation in appointments to federal boards and agencies; and affirm that any existing remnants of institutional barriers that limit opportunities for visible minorities or other groups or individuals are dismantled.

My government will continue to assert a positive leadership role in opposing racism and discrimination, in whatever form. It will continue to resist injustices imposed upon any ethnic, religious, or racial group in the knowledge that to do otherwise would diminish this nation's profound commitment to universal tolerance and human dignity.

Honourable Members: you will be asked to consider amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act, which will represent further progress in the long march of this nation towards full equality.

My government will propose comprehensive legislation designed to simplify and improve Canada's refugee determination process. These reforms will produce a system which is both fair and effective. It will assist genuine refugees in need of protection and discourage abuse of Canada's humanitarian tradition.

My government recognizes fully the essential relationship between a healthy environment and the quality of Canadian life. A new Environmental Protection Act will be introduced to improve my government's capacity, in concert with the provinces, to deal effectively with pollution, focusing on toxic chemicals. You will also be asked to consider measures to improve water quality in Canada and to safeguard citizens from the hazards of chemicals in our society.

My government remains determined to pursue with the United States the rapid implementation of the recommendations of our Special Envoys with respect to acid rain.

Following the recommendations of an industry-labour-government task force, my government will propose legislation to establish a Workplace Hazardous Materials Information System.

My government has begun to renew our economy and society for the benefit of all Canadians. It has acted to strengthen our national sovereignty and to affirm our independence. But there remains much more to be done.

Each generation of Canadians has risen to the challenges of nation-building. Today's generation confronts its own challenges: we must act now to ensure that the ties which bind us together as Canadians remain strong, in our national cultural institutions, in our sense of community and in our pride as a nation.

Whether through railways in the last century, or broadcasting in this century, Canadians have responded to the task of building one nation across a massive continent. Throughout our history, Canadians have acquired credentials as peacekeepers, as entrepreneurs, as innovators.

Today the new challenge is to assert our interests in a world that is intimate, competitive, and driven by rapid technological change.

Your challenge, in this Parliament, is to apply those Canadian qualities with the same vision and the same commitment that created a nation from a wilderness. The new challenge is to open up new horizons for Canadians — those to be reached through knowledge and information.

In this new environment, we must ensure that all Canadians can pursue their own dreams and expand their own opportunities through greater use of information and knowledge about one another and the world beyond.

To begin debate on this fundamental challenge, my government will define its objectives and ways to achieve them.

It will be essential to ensure that the ideas and information which flow through a modern national communications system reflect the distinct cultural values of the Canadian people. For this reason, the government will act to strengthen the Canadian broadcasting system and renew our commitment to Canadian cultural values.

To a considerable degree, our sense of national purpose, our national identity, and our economic prosperity will depend on our capacity to respond to the opportunities which flow from this new information age.

Our dual linguistic heritage and unique history situate Canada within two great communities of nations, the Commonwealth and la Francophonie.

Canada is thus positioned to reaffirm its role in the world by developing joint projects with member countries of these two vast families of nations, to share with them Canadian communications and information technologies while bringing to Canadians a greater diversity of ideas and cultural expressions. By so doing, Canada will renew in innovative ways its commitment to an established institution, the Commonwealth, and contribute actively to the emergence of a new one, la Francophonie.

The great tasks to which you are committed in this Parliament are national in character. The important reforms you will have considered and adopted give to each the opportunity to make a valued, individual contribution to the legislative process.

Your deliberations must address the aspirations of all Canadians and reflect their pride and confidence in the enduring strengths of the political institutions they believe to be the guarantors of freedom and security, and the guardians of the nation's future.

My government shares the expectations of all Canadians that public office holders maintain the highest standards of conduct, especially in the area of conflict of interest. It will be considering proposals which reflect the essential considerations of fairness to the office holder and the protection of the public's interest.

Members of the House of Commons:

I think with pleasure of the determination you will display as you embark on the program of work prepared by my government, and of the good use you will make of your skill and experience. I shall follow your debates with interest. I am assured that this new session will mark a further stage in the growth and flowering of our life as a nation.

You will be asked to appropriate the funds required to carry on the services and expenditures authorized by Parliament.

*Honourable Members of the Senate,
Members of the House of Commons:*

You will be asked to consider legislation to advance the economic, social and international interests of Canadians.

In pursuit of these worthy objectives, may Divine Providence guide your efforts.

The House of Commons withdrew.

Her Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

TRIBUTES

The Honourable John J. MacDonald was born in 1891 and was appointed to this place in 1958 from Queen's, Prince Edward Island. Senator MacDonald was a farmer, a former president of the Prince Edward Island Dairymen's Association. He was a candidate in two provincial elections in the late 1940s and early 1950s.

Senator MacDonald had enlisted in World War I in 1916 and went overseas in 1917. He was awarded the Distinguished Conduct Medal which was, and I quote, "granted to a soldier who has performed service of a distinctly gallant and distinguished nature." He was commissioned as a lieutenant in 1918 and demobilized in 1919 as a captain.

Senator MacDonald had led a full and eventful life before coming to this chamber at the age of 67. He served Prince Edward Island and Canada for 13 years in the Senate before retiring in 1971. He died on September 24, near the age of 95. I want his family and friends on the Island and elsewhere to know that he is remembered here by a number of former colleagues, and that all of us have paid tribute to his contribution to the Island and to Canada in war and in peace.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I wish to take a moment to join in the tributes to our former colleagues.

For 13 years the late Senator Welch and I shared an office. We became very close friends and my admiration for him increased during those years.

Senator Welch led an interesting and productive life. He was a merchant and, later on, he had a very large apple orchard in Wolfville, Nova Scotia, as well as being involved in real estate. He was quite active in municipal politics and was president of the Nova Scotia Progressive Conservative Association. Senator Welch was appointed to the Senate in 1962 and served in this chamber until 1975. He often said that as his first welcome to the Senate he was asked to introduce the legislation dealing with the establishment of the Atlantic Provinces Development Board, and he always appreciated that privilege and honour.

Senator Welch had a deep love for Nova Scotia and its people, and he and I would often chat about Nova Scotia and its citizens. He would mention a certain family and say, "Yes, they came from Parrsboro," or "They came from Cape Breton." He always knew various members of the family in question, and usually ended up by saying that they were fine people.

I attended Senator Welch's funeral and was able to extend to his wife, Lois, the sympathy of the members of the Senate, and particularly of those who had the privilege of knowing him.

The late Senator J. J. MacDonald was born in rural P.E.I. He was of Scottish heritage. One of my fondest memories is of his telling me that as a young lad in P.E.I. he used to look out from his farm window and see smoke rising from the chimneys of nine other farms. Then he would say in his deep voice, "And they were all MacDonalds." I am sure that my seatmate will not disagree with that. As a young lad he went to western Canada and, as has been mentioned, he enlisted in Edmonton.

Senator Murray mentioned that he received the Distinguished Conduct Medal. I have not yet had an opportunity to undertake a thorough search, but it is my understanding that he was one of five Canadians awarded that high decoration for service in World War I. In World War II he served as an instructor with the rank of captain.

He was very active in the Prince Edward Island co-operative movement and various other farm organizations. Many of the dairy policies that are in place in P.E.I. today were the original idea of the late Senator J.J. MacDonald.

He knew personal tragedy in his life; his son, who operated the farm, was killed in an automobile accident. After his wife's death in 1971 he retired from the Senate and went to live with his daughter, Mrs. MacIntyre, in Saskatchewan for a short time. He then returned to the Sacred Heart Home in Charlottetown where he was very well thought of. He had many visitors. He continued to take an interest in the activities of the Senate and made inquiries concerning various individuals when I visited him.

The late Senator Cook received a very high compliment on his appointment. At the time of his appointment I asked the now Lieutenant Governor of Newfoundland what he thought of it. He told me then that if he were making the appointment, he would have appointed someone like the late Senator Cook. That compliment was paid by a member of one party on the appointment of a senator from the other party.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I join with those who have just spoken in extending my condolences to the families of those honourable senators who have passed away, especially to the family of the late Senator Cook, as he was a personal friend of mine.

[Translation]

I would like to say a few words about Senator Cook on the occasion of his sudden death. He was not only my colleague, but a personal friend of mine. Our friendship dated back 20 years, to when we were both appointed to the Senate. His friends and mine became the friends of both of us, and they all benefited from his spiritual and moral qualities, his sincerity and his good humour.

[English]

Bilingualism had nothing to do with our friendship; all I know about it is that he had to invent French words and I had to invent English ones.

[Translation]

Even after he left, we continued to benefit from his visits to the Senate and to enjoy his lasting friendship.

I deplore his sudden death as much as if I were myself a member of his family.

I extend to Mrs. Cook and her children my sincere condolences for their cruel loss.

[English]

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I was shocked to hear of the sudden passing of our former colleague, Senator Eric Cook.

On Friday, August 22, I telephoned Eric at his home in Harbour Grace, Newfoundland, because I knew he had suffered a heart attack two months previously; my call was to inquire about his state of health. We chatted for a short time. He seemed to be in great spirits and told me that he had completely recovered and was looking forward to returning to Ottawa in the fall. So, you can well imagine my feelings when, in a telephone conversation the following Monday with a friend in St. John's, I learned that Eric had passed away on Sunday, August 24, 1986.

Senator Eric Cook was a leader in the civil, legal and political life of our province. He was a leading member of the legal profession; he served as deputy mayor of the city of St. John's; he was president of the Liberal Party of Newfoundland and Labrador; and he was a long-time chancellor of the Anglican Diocese of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Despite his very busy schedule, he always had time to counsel and guide those of us who were a little younger. I will long remember his patience and understanding.

All honourable senators who served with Eric will remember his exemplary attendance in this chamber and his dedication to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

I would like to take this opportunity to express my most sincere sympathy to his wife, Mary, his daughter, Elizabeth, his sons, Peter, David, Jonathan, and their wives. They have lost a devoted husband and father, and Canada has lost a great Canadian.

Before I resume my seat, I would like to join with those who have spoken before me in extending to the families of the late Senators Welch and MacDonald my sincere sympathy.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I do not very often rise on occasions of condolences, but I must do so today with respect to Senator Eric Cook. As Senator Denis has said, it was in February 1964 that Senator Denis and Senator Cook and I were inducted into this chamber; and subsequently I became Senator Cook's deskmate. That was an experience that I will never forget. I remember very well his turning to me and saying, after the prayers had been spoken in French, "Why are we praying for Charles de Gaulle?" I was quite baffled by that remark until I looked at the French wording of the prayer and saw that it was praying for Prince Charles Régis. In that way I was starting to learn the Newfoundland dialect!

Eric, to me, epitomized the ambience of the Senate at that time. He was courteous, knowledgeable and conscientious. He contributed to our committee work in a way that was completely outstanding. But the very essence of Eric was that he was a gentleman.

In many ways I think of Eric as a "real Newfoundlander." I have for many years maintained that Newfoundland has contributed all the salt to our parliamentary life and has made it tasteful and exciting.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Lang: Eric, above all, stood for the interests of his province and, against great pressures at times exerted upon him, stood strongly for those interests: the well-being of his province following from the Confederation pact and the benefits following from the exploitation of Newfoundland's offshore resources. That took courage and independence of mind, which are, I find, characteristics of all the Newfoundlanders I have met during my parliamentary career. Eric was intellectually honest, above all; he was also wise, and he had one of the most delightful self-deprecating senses of humour I have ever encountered. I know that all of us who knew Eric will sadly miss him. I join with all of you in expressing to his wife, Mary, and to his family our sympathy in their loss and in ours.

● (1410)

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, some most appropriate remarks have been made so I shall be very brief.

Of all the gentlemen I have met in this chamber, and there are a great many, I have never met anyone to compare with Eric. He was the soul of honour and the source of wit, kindness and generosity all built in together. He was modest to an extreme, but always ready for fun. As a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce he always had plenty of time for fun. He kept the committee's proceedings modulated and on an even keel. His comments were always a tremendous source of interest, and his ability was appreciated by all.

It is amazing that quite often, although not always, able people are modest. He was a rare combination of both. No member of this house was better liked during his years here than Eric himself.

His lovely wife came from a distinguished Newfoundland family, as did he. She is a charming, delightful person who is full of fun and energy. With their nice children they were a source of pleasure to everyone.

I apologize for taking up this further period of time, but I cannot help mentioning the third gentleman, a most worthy representative of this great Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I knew all three of the senators whose passing we are noting today. I did not know Senator MacDonald very well as our time in this chamber overlapped by only a few months; but Senators Welch and Cook I knew very well, indeed. I join with those who have paid tribute to the qualities of all three of these men, and add my expression of condolence to the surviving members of each of their families.

But, honourable senators, as the senator from the Annapolis Valley I must make special mention of Senator Frank Welch. He was about 15 years older than I, he having been born in 1900 whereas I was born in 1915. I always knew of him as a leading businessman in an area a little farther up the Annapolis Valley. I knew of him as a leader in the agricultural industry in the Valley, particularly in the production of Annapolis Valley apples. He was a director of, among other things, the United Fruits Co. Ltd., and in his long career he involved himself largely with the activities that made the business in the Annapolis Valley productive and known throughout the world. He was himself a significant factor in the export of Annapolis Valley apples many years ago.

Our tenure in this chamber overlapped for a while, during which time I got to know him better and to know his charming wife who has been referred to by previous speakers.

I pay tribute to his service as a citizen of his community. He started off in municipal politics in Kentville. As a Nova Scotian he was, as I think has been said, the president of the Progressive Conservative Party of Nova Scotia for a number of years during the 1950s. I also pay tribute to him as a Canadian and to the contribution he made as a member of this chamber.

I am glad to add my word of tribute to Frank Welch along with the other two senators whose loss we regret today and, again, to extend my sympathy to the surviving members of their families and, particularly, if I may say so, to Lois Welch and the members of Frank Welch's family.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I may, I will just take a few minutes of the Senate's time to add my voice to those who have paid tribute to our three distinguished colleagues and who have offered condolences to their families. I would particularly like to say a word about my very dear friend, Senator Eric Cook, who is probably best known to me among the three ex-members of the Senate to whom we pay tribute this afternoon.

Senator Cook was a long time friend of mine as, indeed, he was to every Newfoundlander who had any interest at all in public life. As the son of one of the revered and respected mayors of St. John's, Sir Tasker Cook, I think that Eric had the political gene passed directly down to him and he exercised it with great ability and with great talent. There are those of his party here in Ottawa who from time to time had occasion to feel something less than satisfied with Eric's independence. Let me assure my honourable friends opposite that he was every bit as independent as President of the Liberal Party in the province of Newfoundland, and I am sure that he occasioned Mr. Smallwood just as much disquietude, and perhaps more, as he did to those sitting opposite. Let me say that his motives were never dishonourable or selfish. He never acted out of fits of pique, but on matters of principle respecting those things he felt deeply about, and there was nothing he felt more deeply about than that beloved rock that he represented so well.

I remember well his advocacy of John Crosbie's leadership of the Liberal Party in Newfoundland. I think that there was no other prominent Liberal at the time who so early took on the establishment as did Eric, and, for a man who had settled comfortably into the ranks of the Senate, I thought it was quite a remarkable display of interest and of tribute to his party, which he was trying to rejuvenate, and to his province, which he was trying to serve.

As a former deputy mayor of St. John's, as a lawyer and former Master of the Newfoundland Supreme Court, as President of the Newfoundland Liberal Party for many, many years and as a prominent businessman—owner of what I suppose was a landmark, McMurdo's drug store on Water Street, which all of us from Newfoundland remember so well—he and his family have made such a lasting contribution to our province and, latterly, to our country that I thought I should stand, thank him for his service and offer my condolences to Mary, to his three sons and to Elizabeth, his daughter. I rise once again to say how deeply I appreciated his friendship and honour his memory.

Hon. D.G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I should like to join all those who have said a word about Senator Eric Cook, and to convey my condolences especially to his wife, Mary, for whom I have the highest regard.

At the outset, let me say that I had and have the highest esteem for Eric Cook, who was both a Liberal and an independent, which I think is a great thing.

Senator Doody: And a rare thing!

Senator Lang: Why not join us?

Senator Steuart: They are not inseparable, as you Tories may realize some day.

Honourable senators, I am sure that if Eric is looking down on us—and he is—he is thinking, "I wonder when anybody is going to say anything about what I was really like." I want to say that I admired Eric Cook and I liked Eric Cook—I sat beside him when I first came into the Senate chamber and we developed a very great friendship. But I think Eric would appreciate hearing me say that when he left this chamber there were two things about him that I never forgot: one, that he never spoke either official language; and, two, that he continually tried to draw to an inside straight and never made it. Perhaps some who did not know him as well as I did will not admire those attributes as much as I do.

Honourable senators, Eric Cook left his mark on Newfoundland as he left his mark on the Senate, and I am sure I speak for everyone when I say that we are all sorry at his passing and that we send our condolences and our highest regards to his wonderful wife, Mary.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I join with other colleagues in paying tribute to the memory of all three senators, namely, Senators Cook, John J. MacDonald and Welch.

I had the opportunity to know and meet each of those senators, but because on this side of the house considerable eulogy has been paid to the memory of Senator Cook and Senator Welch, I thought that I should revive in my own mind my association with a fellow islander in the person of the late Senator John Joseph MacDonald.

I remember quite clearly when the late Senator MacDonald was appointed to the Senate of Canada from the province of Prince Edward Island, and I must say that when I heard that tribute was to be paid today I was greatly surprised that he had lived such a long life; but on reflection it is not surprising for a person bearing the name MacDonald.

Other senators—particularly the whip of the Conservative Party, who was a colleague from Prince Edward Island—recounted the career of Senator MacDonald as a farmer, as a veteran and as a community activist. I must say that when he came to Ottawa he had great directness in his conversation and opinions, and it was clear to anyone who met him that he was a man of the soil, not given to subtleties or cloaking his thoughts in circumlocution. Everyone knew that he was a strong supporter of Mr. Diefenbaker. He thought that John Diefenbaker was a considerable person, and he thought the Tories were terrific.

Therefore, honourable senators, I would not like the memory of Senator John Joseph MacDonald not to be properly mentioned on this side of the house, and not to have it known that there are those of us still on the Hill who remember his arrival, who regretted his departure from Ottawa, and who now regret his passing.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

That the Committee report no later than February 26, 1987.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, for the record, Senator Leblanc's motion is for reference to a committee that at the moment does not exist but, of course, might exist at the time the motion is returnable. I say that so that there will be no doubt that we have not yet constituted such a committee. One day someone might read Hansard and wonder how we could have constituted the committee so quickly.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Senator Leblanc mentioned this point this morning when we discussed the matter. He is aware of the situation and is willing to abide by it.

SHIPBUILDING

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ALLOCATION OF CONTRACTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I take great pleasure in reporting that when the Senate assembles next week 20 million visitors will have come to British Columbia for Expo '86. This figure represents the largest attendance at any time in the world's history at a world's fair of this type, because Expo '86 is, of course, a "theme" fair.

On behalf of British Columbians, I want to thank my colleagues in the other provinces and the people of those other provinces for the superb support which they have accorded to

Expo '86. Not only did we recruit employees from all of the other provinces to work at the fair but we have enjoyed unprecedented collaboration from all of the other provinces and the territories. There are splendid exhibits from almost all of the provinces and territories, including the Atlantic provinces, Quebec and Ontario. We had the support of the previous federal government for the fair, and we have enjoyed the continuing support of the new federal government. On behalf of British Columbians, I want to say thank you for helping us make Expo '86 the success that it has been. To my colleagues, I say that if you have not yet been to the fair, please come soon, because it will not be open for very much longer.

I will now come to my question!

Senator Flynn: You had leave, I presume!

Senator Perrault: Yes, I had leave! A former leader has reminded me of my responsibility in that regard.

It is, I think, the view of most Canadians that a viable shipbuilding industry is of great importance to this nation, whether that industry be located in the Atlantic provinces, along the St. Lawrence, at other points in eastern Canada or along the west coast. I can report that unemployment on the west coast is distressingly high. The unemployment in our shipbuilding industry is very high, indeed, and there are other job losses threatened.

I wonder whether the Leader of the Government can provide us with assurances that west coast shipbuilding yards will be given an opportunity to participate actively in the icebreaker program and other shipbuilding programs of this government.

Frankly, honourable senators, we have yet to see one major project of any significance implemented on the west coast since this new government took power, and we are waiting for those campaign promises to be fulfilled.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the west coast shipyards are not alone in facing serious difficulties. The entire shipbuilding industry in Canada—and, indeed, in the world—is in serious difficulty. In Canada that industry is existing almost solely on the basis of government contracts and is, by general consent, I think, in serious need of rationalization.

With regard to the icebreaker program, I can tell the honourable senator that the government is now considering various options with respect to design and construction, and that the west coast yards figure very prominently in those options.

With regard to the preamble of the honourable senator, I draw to his attention and to the attention of the house that the Speech from the Throne read by Her Excellency yesterday afternoon noted that Expo '86 had been a focus of international attention that had brought pride and joy to millions of Canadians, and that the success of British Columbia's world exposition strikingly demonstrates the creative skills of our people. That is one paragraph in the Speech from the Throne among, I hope, many that will enjoy unanimous approval in Parliament and in the country. To that I would simply add—I am sure on behalf of all honourable senators and of all Canadians who have attended Expo '86—our hearty congratulations to the government and people of British Columbia and to the people who organized Expo '86 for making of that exposition a resounding success that has done both British Columbia and Canada proud.

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL DISCUSSIONS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. First of all, may I offer him my congratulations on his being appointed Leader of the Government in the Senate, but more particularly on his appointment as Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. I think that this is a very good and useful position for the Leader of the Government in the Senate to hold, because it provides both the Leader of the Government and all other senators with assistance in carrying out our responsibilities as representatives of regional interests. I, therefore, hope that Senator Murray will be forthcoming in updating us from time to time on the discussions taking place between the officials of the federal government and the provincial governments on a number of matters that are of primary concern, or which may be topical from time to time.

Right now I can think of two very specific matters in my part of Canada that fall under that heading, and those are agriculture and energy and the depression in those two areas. I think it is particularly appropriate that the Speech from the Throne, as read yesterday, did make mention of both of those economic areas and referred to the fact that discussions were to be held with the provinces with a view to finding solutions to those problems, and particularly those in the agricultural area.

I wonder, therefore, if the Leader of the Government in the Senate can tell us what kind of discussions are taking place. In other words, what is the subject matter of those discussions? Are we talking about the debt load of farmers, or are we discussing some assistance in dealing with problems resulting from the severe harvesting conditions, or are the discussions more in the area of how to deal with the intense competition in world trade? That subject was also mentioned in the Speech from the Throne yesterday, particularly with respect to grains and what is being done by both the EEC and the United States in that respect. As I said, it would be helpful if the honourable minister could give us an update on those specific matters, and if he could, perhaps, set out generally how we should approach him in order that we can receive updating from time to time on how these matters will be resolved.

[Senator Murray.]

As to the variety of other subjects that the honourable senator has raised, I can tell him that the federal Minister of Agriculture and his provincial counterparts have been working these past months on a common agricultural strategy for discussion at the First Ministers' Conference in Vancouver in November. If there is specific information required on any one of these subjects that the honourable senator has raised, I will be glad to refer the question to the Honourable John Wise.

I may take the occasion to say that in the Department of Agriculture—as in virtually every department of government—there are bilateral programs and bilateral discussions going on between Ottawa and the provinces in which I am not directly involved, and for which I am not directly responsible. My role is to act as an adviser to the Prime Minister on federal-provincial relations and, in particular, on constitutional matters, to chair a cabinet committee on federal-provincial relations, and to assist with first ministers' conferences and a number of other matters of that kind. Therefore, I am not directly responsible for the many scores of bilateral programs between provincial and federal departments. However, I will be glad to obtain as much information as I can for the Senate on those matters.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I thank the honourable minister for that much information, but I must tell him that at the conclusion it is almost as nebulous as it was at the beginning. In other words, you can throw the whole thing into the pot and say we are responsible for all of these things.

I want, first of all, to have clarification on his stated viewpoint that these matters can be passed to federal-provincial conferences. When can we have an indication of what will be on the agenda at the federal-provincial conference? For example, we know now that one of the most difficult elements of the agricultural problem in western Canada—and there are several—is the enormous debt service charges. I would like to ask the minister whether that matter is on the agenda.

Perhaps we could be a little more frank and open about this.

I could ask all of the specific questions. Could the leader tell us what they are dealing with at the moment? Are they dealing with that debt problem at the moment, or are they dealing with the international trade competition problem, or what? I think it would expedite our discussions if the leader were a little more forthcoming.

Senator Murray: As far as the agenda for the First Ministers' Conference is concerned, I trust that that will be settled shortly. That is the subject of ongoing discussions between the provinces, represented by Premier Getty, who is co-ordinating on that side this year, and the federal government. Officials have met and ministers have been in touch with each other. It should not be long before the agenda is settled.

I can say that agriculture will be placed on the agenda, because that item was left unfinished at the previous First Ministers' Conference, as were several others.

As far as discussions regarding specific problems in the domain of agriculture are concerned, I think my friend can take it for granted that all of these matters are the subject of discussions between the federal minister and his provincial counterparts. They are all the subject of policy considerations by the Government of Canada.

With regard to the general commitments made in the Speech from the Throne, my answer must be that further information, elaboration and explanation will come when specific announcements are made by the ministers responsible.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, before asking a supplementary question, I wish to congratulate the leader on his appointment to cabinet. We got along nicely with his predecessor. I hope that that goodwill will continue; in fact, I am sure it will. Senator Murray conducted himself as chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in a commendable manner. I have confidence he will do exactly the same in the position he now holds in the cabinet and in the Senate.

My question is this: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate hold out any hope to western farmers that in the near future the government will bring forward a program of deficiency payments for the grain producers? There was no mention of western farmers in the Speech from the Throne; I do not believe there was any mention of them, in any event. I am glad that the Leader of the Government mentioned western farmers.

There has been a major let down in western Canada because of the words used in the Speech from the Throne. There is a feeling that the Speech is so imprecise and nebulous that it really constitutes a declaration that there will not be deficiency payments announced in the near future. I would appreciate the leader's comments in that regard.

Bearing in mind his position in cabinet, I think it is important that he tell us where the government stands. I think he can be helpful in moving these things forward.

Senator Murray: I thank Senator Argue and Senator Olson for their kind words of congratulations to me on my appointment to the cabinet.

Honourable senators, Speeches from the Throne are framed in terms of more general commitments. I must say that I find it difficult to understand why the honourable senator would not have recognized in the Speech from the Throne what I call a very clear signal on the part of the government to western farmers and to our international competition—that is, that the government intends to stand behind western farmers in their efforts to confront unfair international competition.

As to how that will be done, when that will be done and what programs will be brought to bear, I am afraid my friend will have to be patient and wait for specific announcements from the responsible ministers.

Senator Argue: Those words are almost as nebulous, if I may say so, as those contained in the Speech from the Throne. There is a suggestion that steps will be taken to "alleviate personal hardship," and "my government will spare no effort in seeking to protect the interests of Canada's farming community." Does that mean there will be more speeches in the international arena? Is that what that means, or is there a possibility—at least a possibility—that there will be an announcement of major deficiency payments in the near future?

The Deputy Premier of Saskatchewan took the same flight I took to Ottawa. He was in Ottawa on Tuesday. The words contained in the Speech from the Throne indicate that he had precious little influence on the government. While it may or may not be known that he was in Ottawa, the Deputy Premier of Saskatchewan, the Honourable E. A. Berntson, had only one thing on his mind, politics, which is perfectly proper, because there is an election to take place in Saskatchewan. I know he is sincere in wanting deficiency payments announced in the very near future; I also know he is as disappointed as western farmers are because of the lack of action by the government.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am sorry that Senator Argue did not see fit to preface his comments with some reference to the action that this government has already taken to improve the stabilization payments and to help farmers who are in financial difficulties. The fact of the matter is that western farmers—prairie farmers—this year will have received over $2 billion in transfer payments from the federal government. I tell the honourable senator that that is an increase in federal payments to western agriculture of over $1.5 billion on the average that existed from 1981 to 1984. So, I think the government's previous action in this respect is the best indicator of the government's good faith and of its future intentions.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I am surprised that the Leader of the Government in the Senate would bring those figures forward and say that that was the action the government took. The government could not help but put that money in the farmers' pockets, because that money was provided by the Crop Insurance Act and the Western Grain Stabilization Act, both of which have been on the statute books for a long, long time.

During the past few weeks what has the government done? It has removed the PGRT and has given $1.5 billion in tax revenue release and benefit to the big oil companies; 48 hours later the same government announced $46 million would be dispensed to 9,000 farmers to assist them in getting off their farms. That constitutes less than 3 per cent, but that is for the purpose of getting farmers off their farms. I think that is a very bad record and a great disappointment.

I can tell the Leader of the Government something else about that program that really upsets me; that is, if a family leaves the farm and goes to the city, the husband will receive $140 a week, the wife $28 a week and each child $14 a week. For a family of four or six, that is less money than they would receive on welfare.

Again, my question is: When is there going to be some action and when are the farmers going to get more than a slap in the face?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have already answered the question inasmuch as there was a question. It is clear that the honourable senator wishes to debate the matter. I invite him to do so during the course of the debate on the motion for an Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

GRAIN HANDLERS' STRIKE-LOCKOUT—PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Hazen Argue: I have another question relating to agriculture: Can the minister tell us whether or not there has been any progress in the negotiations to end the grain handlers' strike-lockout at Thunder Bay? Does the leader have any indication that Mr. Kelly, the federal mediator, is making any progress in that strike-lockout at Thunder Bay?

Senator Argue: I do not like getting political, because I do not have a political nature, but is the leader not aware that when there was a similar situation threatened in 1981 the Minister of Labour of the day, the Honourable Gerald Regan, appointed Bill Kelly to help mediate the threatened strike ten days before the strike took place? That strike was settled 16 days into it, but it took this government almost four weeks to appoint the same Bill Kelly to deal with a similar situation.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the government is perfectly ready to defend the steps it has taken and the time it has taken to take those steps after this matter has been resolved. Again, I invite the honourable senator to debate the matter at the appropriate time.

Senator Argue: But why did the government take so long to appoint Bill Kelly? Why did the government let the strike drag on for four weeks at an enormous cost when, if Mr. Kelly had been appointed earlier, I am certain the strike-lockout would have been over long ago?

● (1450)

Senator Murray: Well, I am interested to have Senator Argue's certainties recorded for posterity, but I tell him that the government is perfectly prepared to defend its position on this matter and we will do so at the appropriate time when this matter is resolved—which I hope will be soon—and I invite him to join the debate. Either I or one of my colleagues will speak on behalf of the government on this matter.

INDUSTRY

AEROSPACE—ALLOCATION OF CF-18 SERVICE CONTRACTS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, before I ask my question of the Leader of the Government, I would like to join my colleagues in expressing my sincere congratulations to him. He is taking on a major challenge—particularly in the field of federal-provincial relations. Those of us from the smaller provinces have a very particular interest in that area, and I certainly wish him well.

He will not be surprised, however, if I, as a Manitoban, express some regrets at the departure of Senator Roblin from that post. I have had the pleasure, or you might say the challenge, of trying to elicit information from Senator Roblin for some 30 years as we have sat across from each other, and I will miss that opportunity.

Hon. Duff Roblin: With most reasonable influence.

Senator Molgat: I will now come to my question. There was a good deal of discussion earlier this year about the awarding of the contract for the overhaul of the CF-18 aircraft. All indications were that the Bristol Aircraft Company, in Winnipeg, was to get that contract. Recently there have been a number of speculative stories which indicate that this is not to happen, that the contract will be going to Canadair in Montreal. I wonder if the minister can give us any information on the matter, where it stands, and also if he can tell us when it might be resolved.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

PROPOSED LEGISLATION—ANTICIPATED DATE OF INTRODUCTION

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday in the Speech from the Throne there was mention of legislation with regard to the Official Languages Act. Can you tell us when we can expect this legislation, please?

BRITISH COLUMBIA

ALLOCATION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I neglected to mention, when I was first on my feet this afternoon, the fact that we have a new Leader of the Government in this chamber, and I, together with my other colleagues, want to join in wishing the new leader every success in his post. We also wish to thank the distinguished former leader who did such a proficient job on behalf of the government. Defending the government is a difficult task these days, and I do not underestimate the challenge it poses.

I have a brief question. During this summer one of the Conservative members of Parliament from British Columbia, Mr. Robert Wenman, of the Fraser Valley, aspired to become the new Premier of British Columbia. He ran for the Socred leadership. Despite the generous offer of his services, his services were found not to be needed by the delegates, so now he is back in the House of Commons.

During the course of his campaign, he emphasized that:

British Columbia... is receiving a disproportionately small share of federal contracts.

He added, "They are being shortchanged by my government."

I would like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he has discussed with his colleague from British Columbia the ways in which British Columbia apparently is being shortchanged by this government. Second, I want to ask the Leader of the Government this question: The new Premier of British Columbia, Mr. Vander Zalm, has stated that despite the fact that British Columbia is the third largest province in Canada, only 3 per cent of federal government procurement is undertaken in the province of British Columbia. He said that that number has declined by 3 per cent under this government.

I would like to know whether that figure is accepted by your government or is challenged by your government, and, if it is challenged, what is the correct figure?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, as the former leader of the Liberal Party in British Columbia will know, there is now an election under way in that province and I would not like to be drawn into the election rhetoric there.

As for the statements that he attributes to Mr. Wenman, the member of Parliament, and to Premier Vander Zalm, I must admit that I have not seen those statements. I would have to look at them to try to verify, if possible, the information and the statistics that have been used. Otherwise, I do not think it would be prudent for me to comment at this time.

JUSTICE

CANADA COMMISSION OF INQUIRY ON WAR CRIMINALS—STATUS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Last summer the government extended to the end of September the mandate of the Deschênes commission of inquiry into the possibility that Nazi war criminals are residing in Canada. Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether the government has been given this report of the Deschênes commission, or has its mandate been extended again?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I believe there was an announcement from the honourable Minister of Justice or from the Prime Minister within the last day or two to the effect that the Deschênes commission has been given an extension until the end of November.

An Hon. Senator: Six weeks.

Senator Murray: I beg your pardon, six weeks, in any case, to complete its work. This is not a question of further public hearings but a matter of preparing the report.

Senator Haidasz: Can the Leader of the Government assure us that this is the last extension, because it has received three or four such extensions and many Canadians are already concerned and are having doubts about the work of this commission.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we hope, expect and believe we have an undertaking from the commission that this is the last extension and that the final report will be in on the new due date.

IMMIGRATION

REFUGEE STATUS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I have another question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. News reached the west this morning that there are 600 buses carrying about 29,000 refugees from Iran moving towards Western Europe. I would like to know whether the government is apprised of this development and whether we can expect some type of clear announcement about Canada's true policy on refugees and the prevention of abuses before receiving the comprehensive legislation on refugee determination which was promised yesterday in the Speech from the Throne.

THE ENVIRONMENT

DISPOSAL OF RADIOACTIVE WASTE

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government a question. Before doing so, I wish, as others have done, to offer my sincere congratulations to him. He has certainly set his stamp in the Senate as he has in other areas, and we recognize his formidable talents.

At the same time, I would like to pay my respects to the former leader, as I did when I was a very young man out in Manitoba and saw him perform. I think he made a great contribution while he was leader in the Senate.

I am prompted to ask my question because of the Speech from the Throne and the reference to a "new Environmental Protection Act." I hope you will indulge me by permitting me to make a little preamble to my question.

Canada is like all the other industrial nations which are using nuclear power, and it is grappling with the awesome problem of establishing a permanent site for both low-level and high-level radioactive waste. I use the word "awesome", because no level of radioactivity—natural or man made—has been established as being safe and because scientists define "permanent" as ensuring safety for human health in the environment for the next 10,000 years.

I know that the Right Honourable the Prime Minister is deeply concerned about the selection of the first permanent site for low-level radioactive waste, and rightly so. I saw a letter which he wrote on August 21, 1984, with reference to the Port Hope area in which he said that Mr. Lawrence, the MP for the area, had stated that Eldorado Nuclear Ltd. waste should be removed from major population areas and kept well away from any major water resources such as Lake Ontario.

At present Eldorado Nuclear Ltd. is presenting one site in the agricultural area of Tyrone near the main source of drinking water for the town of Bowmanville, which is located on the edge of Lake Ontario. This site is 15 miles away from Eldorado's other waste sites which are suffering seepage problems.

This one site proposed by Eldorado will involve the Atomic Energy Review process set up by this government, and an intensive series of hearings will be held before a panel of eminent experts. These hearings will also involve time, expertise and financial costs not only for Eldorado but also for the municipal government, the federal government and for community representatives.

My question to the Leader of the Government is: Because this selection will involve the first permanent site in Canada for low-level radioactive waste, and because of the costs in time, expertise and money involved in the lengthy hearings, would the government consider directing Eldorado, which appears to have confined its search to a 15-mile radius, to present more than one site for this selection process?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): At the outset, honourable senators, I wish to thank the distinguished senator for his kind words and express the pleasure that all of us feel in seeing him here after his having been laid up for some time.

He has made representations to the government and, particularly, to the Ministry of the Environment regarding Eldorado. I shall undertake to see that that minister is made aware of those representations and that he replies in due course.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

FORM OF PROPOSED NATIONAL FORUM—"EQUALITY OF OPPORTUNITY"

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and note, in passing, that he is also the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations.

One paragraph that struck me in the Throne Speech yesterday was the one which touched on the government's strong commitment to post-secondary education. Could the Leader of the Government indicate to me what form the national forum proposed for next year, as mentioned in the Throne Speech, will take? Will it be a federal-provincial forum or will it encompass other groups? Will it be a one-shot deal or will it be seen as an ongoing instrument?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am glad to have this opportunity to say a word about that proposal in the Throne Speech.

If there is any concern on anyone's part, let me reiterate that we respect scrupulously the exclusive provincial jurisdiction in the field of education. Nevertheless, the federal government constantly receives representations from all parties whom we assist financially or otherwise with this or that aspect of post-secondary education.

The Secretary of State has been invited to meet with the Council of Ministers of Education. We receive representations from the Canadian Association of University Teachers, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, and the Social Science Federation of Canada in regard to the matching-grant policy of the federal government and its impact on the humanities, and so on.

It occurred to the government that it would be useful, indeed, if all the players, not just the federal government and the provinces but the post-secondary institutions, the other interested groups and citizens could be brought together in a forum to discuss the issues. This would not be a federal-provincial conference and it need not be held under our auspices. We would be very pleased if it were to be held under the auspices of, let us say, the Council of the Ministers of Education or, indeed, some non-governmental body. It is a proposal that the Secretary of State will be discussing with his various interlocutors in the provinces and in the post-secondary education field in the weeks to come.

Senator Fairbairn: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I appreciate the constitutional considerations on this issue. However, I would also hope that with this strong commitment on the part of the government goes a willingness to take a leadership role in dealing with this issue with the provinces.

The one phrase which struck me in the Throne Speech was the phrase, "equality of opportunity." I would like to know whether the government is using that phrase to express its commitment not just to the equality of opportunity of students in Canada to get a post-secondary education in a financial sense but also in the sense of students being able to opt into educational systems across the provinces in an equal fashion.

Senator Murray: The government shares the preoccupation of my honourable friend, which has featured in a number of reports, as she will know, from various parliamentary committees in recent years.

Senator Fairbairn: I should like to follow directly upon that and ask the Leader of the Government the following question: In addition to the idea of a national forum, would the government, through him, not consider the recommendation in the Senate Youth Committee Report which recommended a national task force on the co-ordination of educational opportunities in this country? We envisaged in that report the provinces and the federal government co-operating to try to work out a system of equalizing qualifications across the country.

It seems to me that that might be something which could proceed or go on independent of any national forum. The problem has certainly been around for a long time. I ran into it myself 26 years ago when coming from the University of Alberta to Carleton University. I suggest that the problem has, if anything, intensified in the last two or three decades. Such active involvement on the part of the federal government with the provinces might go a long way towards encouraging students across the country whom we are asking to find jobs, but who are impeded by the educational system from getting the proper scholastic training and knowledge.

Senator Murray: I will keep those comments in mind and undertake to bring them to the attention of the Secretary of State.

TRANSPORT

CLOSING OF CN SHOPS, MONCTON

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I want to join with other senators in congratulating the Leader of the Government on his appointment. Due to the apparent weakness of the ministers who represent the Atlantic provinces in this government at the present time, I express my hope and wish that the Leader of the Government in the Senate will not forget those of us who live in the province of New Brunswick.

More specifically, my question relates to the tremendous impact the closing of the CNR shops is having on the city of Moncton and the province as a whole. More specifically, I refer to the negotiations, which were broken off last Friday or Saturday, between CN and its unions regarding the possibility of a contract which would permit CGE to purchase the shops and start an industry. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us if the government is following these negotiations? Has he anything to tell the people of New Brunswick respecting these various important subjects?

● (1510)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, it is a fact that a few weeks ago the federal government established a three-year, $4 million special initiative for that area. However, respecting the negotiations that are now under way, as the honourable senator has noted, three of the seven unions involved have walked away from the negotiations; they have refused to negotiate. I can only express the hope that the matter will be resolved and that an agreement can be reached before the deadline, which I understand is October 15.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, although I thank the minister for his answer, he has not said very much. That has been the problem for the past couple of years regarding the closing of those shops.

I do want to stress the importance of that industry to New Brunswick. The closing of the shops in Moncton is possibly the most severe blow to New Brunswick in the past 40 years.

Senator Murray: How many years?

Senator Thériault: Forty years.

Senator Murray: Forty?

Senator Thériault: Yes. The shops in Moncton became an institution of that province. They represented employment not only to people in the city of Moncton but to people in all of the surrounding areas. The degradation of CN in New Brunswick is felt not only in Moncton but all over the place, as I am sure my colleagues from New Brunswick can attest to. It is a severe shock to the people of New Brunswick.

I am sure that the minister is aware of the seriousness of this affair, yet all he can offer by way of a solution is the information that $4 million will be spent over three years. I think that if the minister cannot mention anything more substantial than $4 million spread over three years to replace the loss of over 1,200 jobs, then he should not mention anything at all. Perhaps he should say that the government is hoping to do something more worthwhile than spend $4 million over three years. We in the Atlantic provinces are not that gullible, although the Minister of Transport may think that we are.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is obvious from the tone and content of the question—if it was a question—that the honourable senator wishes to debate the matter, and I invite him to do so at the appropriate time. It is good, however, to be precise about these matters. The figure that I have in front of me indicates that there are at the CN shops some 1,022 jobs. My information is that Canadian General Electric would employ some 300 people, that CN will transfer to the Gordon yards 150 people, that some 130 people will remain in the shops in administration and that some 200 are being transferred to other places. That leaves for possible layoff, but also for possible retraining or early retirement, 237 employees.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, the minister has explained those figures. I thought there were 1,200 jobs, because I was thinking in terms of the last two years. Two years ago there were more than 1,200 people working at those shops. If anyone wishes to discuss the subject with them, the employees will say that they are worried to death about the transfer of 150 jobs to the so-called Gordon yards, because they know that in the long run the work will not be available to them. If they stay there, it means that other people will lose their jobs. Without the involvement of CGE approximately 1,000 jobs will be lost to the Moncton area, and with the involvement of CGE that figure will still be over 400. If the minister wants to debate the matter, and if he feels like the Minister of Transport does that this problem is nothing, that is one thing. But my question is: Does he really believe that $4 million spread over three years will begin to compensate for the loss of all of those jobs?

Senator Murray: I do invite my honourable friend to raise the matter during the debate on the Address in Reply and we shall debate it.

PAROLE

RELEASE OF INMATES

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Of the many important problems to be resolved in these days, according to the government, one of the most important was related to the delay of the liberation of prisoners. That was so important that it needed a special sitting of Parliament. Can the Leader of the Government tell us how many prisoners have been released on mandatory supervision since the passage of Bill C-67? I would like to know how many prisoners who were promised release on good behaviour were refused that release by the Parole Board due to the passage of that bill during the special sitting. How many of those prisoners have been refused their liberation?

Senator Denis: I will do that.

Senator Murray: I will see what information can be released on this matter by the government.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, a question of that kind can be put in written form, but it seems to me it can also be put orally. In any event, the senator has undertaken to put the question in writing. I simply wanted to say that I do not think the question was out of order.

Senator Murray: I believe there is a rule that states quite clearly that questions of that kind should be put in written form and the information brought in in that way.

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Murray: As I say, such questions can be put orally, and I suppose that they can be answered orally if the minister is walking around with all of those statistics in his head, which this minister is not.

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, I felt that since a special sitting of Parliament was called to deal with that problem, and since it was so urgent, the government should know the number of prisoners who were refused release after having been promised their release on good behaviour. I thought that, since it was so important an issue that the government called for a special sitting, even if it were a written question, in a day or two we could get that information. I do not think there are hundreds of those prisoners, so it would be easy to inform the house of how many of them have been released on mandatory supervision. This is very important, because those prisoners have been promised release on mandatory supervision and, because of the passage of that bill, the Parole Board can now refuse to release them.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the government does have this information, but the Leader of the Government in the Senate does not have those figures in his head and he will undertake to obtain that information.

With regard to the exchange between the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and me, I direct his attention to rule 20A(1).

Senator Frith: I am looking at it.

Senator Murray: That rule reads:

- (1) A question described in paragraph 20(1)(a), or (b)
 - (a) that seeks statistical or other information not readily available, or
 - (b) to which an answer in writing is desired, shall be sent in writing to the Clerk of the Senate to be placed on the Order Paper until answered.

Senator Frith: Yes, and the justification for that is that the information is not immediately available. The rule to which the Leader of the Government has referred, therefore, has to be read with rule 20(3), which reads:

- (3) If an oral question cannot be answered immediately, the senator to whom it is addressed may take the question as notice.

I think those rules have to be read together, and I think it is quite in order that the question be asked orally. It is in order for the Leader of the Government to ask the senator putting the question if he will do so in writing, but it is also open to the government leader to say that he will try to get the information.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of Her Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. Michel Cogger, seconded by Hon. E. W. Barootes, moved:

That the following Address be presented to Her Excellency the Governor General of Canada.

To Her Excellency the Right Honourable Jeanne Sauv , a Member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, Chancellor and Commander of the Order of Military Merit upon whom has been conferred the Canadian Forces' Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the Senate of Canada in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious Speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

He said: Honourable senators, before starting my speech, perhaps I may take a few moments of your time to pay special tribute to a Canadian woman who, like so many of us, decided to dedicate her career to serving the government and the Prime Minister.

Honourable senators probably read in the press about the tragic death last week of Michèle Bédard, formerly advisor to the Prime Minister on women's issues. Mrs. Bédard brought to this task a thorough knowledge of our society, acquired both academically and through personal and professional experience, all of which was rewarding both for herself and the people in her environment.

Her tragic death marks the loss of an old friend.

The Prime Minister has lost a loyal and dedicated collaborator whose judicious and enlightened advice was instrumental in guiding the course of policies initiated by the government.

I know I speak for all senators in extending to the children of Mrs. Bédard and the other members of her family our feelings of profound sympathy.

Honourable senators, as were all others before me, I am grateful for the honour bestowed on me when I was invited to move the motion for an Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

And as was also the case for many of my predecessors, it is the first time I have been given an opportunity to speak in this chamber. I of course had occasion to take part in the business of this chamber before the summer recess, more specifically in the work of some of the committees. I was able to work with several honourable senators and I could appreciate the diligence, wisdom and experience they brought to their task.

Like so many members of this chamber, I came to the Senate after years of experience acquired working for a political party and its leaders.

I realize that I am in good company here on both sides of this chamber, and I must say it is a pleasure. My past experience will probably be the basis for my participation in our debates and our work. Moreover, my contribution will always be marked by sincerity, dedication and diligence, within the modest limits of my capabilities.

The Speech from the Throne delivered yesterday by Her Excellency marked, it seems to me, a decisive stage in the life of this government. Half-way through its term, it offers Canadians a new legislative agenda, to improve continuity and to increase action in areas that received less attention during the first session.

The government has had to continue its action in all sectors of our economy. The figures are eloquent. The economy has reacted well to initiatives taken in the last two years. Whether we are talking about interest rates, the rate of inflation, the unemployment rate, the situation of Canada has improved considerably during the first half of this government's term.

But that is not enough. The situation inherited by the government was so disastrous that there was a lot of catching up to do. The task was enormous, and the government had to work twice as hard.

We cannot slacken now and we must continue these efforts. And that is what the government has decided to do, after yesterday's proposal to take measures aimed at improving the competitive position of Canadian businesses on international markets, at improving the equality of the job environment, stimulating research and development and improving access to businesses and financial institutions, including co-operatives.

Consistent in its thrust, the Speech from the Throne indicates to us that the government will continue to implement its measures to restore financial health to Canada and thus create a more favourable climate for expansion, growth and the prosperity of all Canadians.

Just as significant as this economic commitment, yesterday's Speech from the Throne included an equally promising social justice objective.

The legislative agenda which has been set forth before both houses is ambitious. It fulfils the two major objectives of this legislative program. First of all, it will support and strengthen existing measures aimed at safeguarding the family while making it easier for women to have equal access to the labour market. The series of measures already announced will complete this legislative program.

Secondly, the other objective—just as important—will be achieved by reinforcing all measures of a primarily preventive nature, specifically those whose main purpose is to do away with the most obvious abuses which still plague our society. By that I mean the legislation related, for example, to prostitution, pornography, drug and alcohol abuse, the protection of women and children who are victims of violence.

The government is courageously and resolutely committed to restoring the quality of our environment and of our life, yet it is ever mindful of its basic responsibility to provide assistance to the underprivileged in our society.

During the next few days of debate on the Speech from the Throne, other senators—first the Honourable Senator Barrotes, of course—will have an opportunity to lay more emphasis on various aspects which I may have missed in these short remarks.

On the other hand, as a senator from Quebec, I could not address this house without highlighting the commendable and sustained efforts of the government with respect to national reconciliation.

The Speech from the Throne reminds us that important questions have yet to be finally settled and remain on the agenda.

In this field, it seems to me that we must step up our efforts to put an end to the alienation felt by the Province of Quebec as a result of the 1982 Accord. We must also strive to fulfil the commitments concerning native people which the federal government and nine provinces made pursuant to that Accord.

On behalf of the government, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister has promised that he will spare no efforts to make sure that Quebec will, as he put it, resume with enthusiasm and dignity its rightful and important role as a full partner in the confederative agreement.

Inasmuch as it has greatly improved relations with the provinces over the past two years, the Mulroney government has set the course towards an active quest for national reconciliation.

Mr. Bourassa's government formulated five conditions for Quebec to become a signatory to the constitutional agreement. In mid-July, the Prime Minister invited all provincial premiers to take part in preliminary talks, to be followed by formal negotiations based on those five conditions.

At their meeting in Edmonton last August, the First Ministers made a positive announcement. They agreed to make reaching an agreement with Quebec their constitutional priority. They agreed to pursue the process proposed by the Prime Minister, a two-stage process which would first consider Quebec's full participation and, second, the constitutional question as a whole.

Honourable senators, for the first time in nearly 20 years, Ottawa has a truly national government, both through its membership and its perspective or vision. All provinces expressed a desire to finish the task that had been left undone in 1982. We can only hope that progress made in recent months will continue and that all partners will maintain the political will to act quickly.

As for the commitment to native peoples, the 1982 agreement provided for a new round of negotiations between native representatives and those of the federal and provincial governments. These talks will mainly concern the issue of self-government.

Under the leadership of Prime Minister Mulroney, the 1985 First Ministers' Conference came very close to an agreement on an amendment that would have resulted in this right to self-government. In 1987, in a few months, a new meeting will be held on the same subject, still on the basis of the mandate given in 1982.

We can only hope that all partners will approach the issue with the firm resolve to succeed and with the genuine will to understand the legitimate concerns of the other parties, and so pave the way to an agreement. Quebec's approval of the constitutional accord and our commitment to native people have a number of things in common. These issues go back further than 1982 and are rooted in our common history on Canadian soil.

These are truly major issues, and we who take part in Canadian public life may have the rare distinction and privilege not only to consider them but to deal with them once and for all in the course of this new parliamentary session.

[English]

Honourable senators, I doubt that the views I have just expressed on the Speech from the Throne will be shared in their totality on both sides of the house.

Senator Frith: A well-founded doubt!

Senator Murray: Don't let that bother you.

[Senator Cogger.]

Senator Cogger: However, the legislation that will be brought before us will be the object of thorough study, for which this chamber and its committees are so justly reputed. More particularly, on this all important matter of national reconciliation, I believe that the efforts of the government are deserving of all the support this chamber can offer, and I know that the Prime Minister and his colleagues can count on it. I thank you very much for your kind attention.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, as I was entering this chamber, one of my senatorial friends asked me if I would be short. I must point out to him that I am about five feet eight inches and the mover of the resolution is only five feet six and a half inches. Today is a triumph for the "shorts".

It is with a sense of profound pride that I exercise a special privilege, that of seconding the motion for the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne opening the Second Session of the Thirty-third Parliament. Witnessing yesterday's solemn ceremony, with all the symbols and traditions that represent the foundations and the very roots of our democratic parliamentary system, was a very moving experience. I was touched by the dignity of the occasion and the inspiring presentation of Her Excellency, our Governor General. Perhaps some honourable senators are not aware of the fact that Madame Sauvé is a native of my province, having been born in Prud'homme, Saskatchewan. About three weeks ago she spent the best part of a week visiting in our province, and gave generously of her time to many public events and in many areas. Included in these was the opening of our new Regina airport and, subsequently, in a very impressive ceremony, she formally delivered the coat of arms to our province by Royal Warrant. Her Excellency's charm and grace, her beautiful dignity and quiet humour delighted and captured the hearts of everyone who met her.

The following week another native son was given homage and recognition. I refer to the celebrations at the unveiling of the bronze statue of the late Right Honourable John George Diefenbaker. Mr. Diefenbaker was thrice Prime Minister of Canada and his career and contribution to Canadian life will remain in reverent memory as long as this country and my province exist.

It is a particular privilege for me to follow and support the motion of my old friend, Senator Cogger, who spoke so eloquently in moving the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and I heartily congratulate him. When one thinks of that recent visit of Her Excellency, coupled with the Diefenbaker unveiling in Ottawa, there is some sort of appropriate symbolism in having a senator from Quebec and myself from Saskatchewan join in supporting the Speech from the Throne. Such events and actions help to bind our two provinces even closer together in this confederation.

The occasion also allows me to be among the first to record officially my congratulations and best wishes to the Honourable John Fraser, the first elected Speaker of the other place.

Senator MacEachen: That is not right.

Senator Barootes: I know that I express the goodwill and respectful regard of all honourable senators, and wish him well in his new duties.

Senator MacEachen: The house always elected speakers.

Senator Barootes: Perhaps you will allow me also to express my personal respect and admiration for the Honourable John Bosley for the dignity, integrity and honest care which he brought to that office. May I also add that I interpret my selection as seconder of the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne not only as recognition of my province but also as recognition of the 250,000 Canadians of Greek ethnic origin who now constitute 1 per cent of the population. It is a group to which I proudly belong.

In being chosen to second this motion, I felt a great deal of humility as I read the speeches and the names of those who had so eloquently addressed this senatorial chamber on previous occasions.

There are several changes in this house that are worthy of personal comment. First, I want to welcome in our midst Senator Atkins whose legendary skills and qualities need no elaboration from me, and I know all senators join me in looking forward to his participation in our deliberations.

Senator Frith: Yes, and he is now out exercising them at this very moment.

Senator Barootes: Second, I wish to salute our trusted and worthy new leader, Senator Lowell Murray, who by experience and character is well suited to the duties and responsibilities of his office. He has a proven record, and will serve Canada well as Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. All senators, sir, applaud and congratulate you.

Senator Frith: We are withholding our applause until the end, as they say.

Senator Barootes: Third, if I may, I would like to express my enduring admiration and eternal gratitude to Senator Roblin whose stalwart leadership, impeccable credentials, unquestioned integrity and gracious manner taught me the traditions of this chamber. I thank him for the infinite patience and tolerance that he has shown to me in particular, but also to all of his colleagues in the Senate.

Finally, may I extend to Senator Neiman a warm and sincere welcome back to this chamber.

This debate offers us the opportunity to review the recent record of the government and of this Senate and to anticipate the future. Honourable senators, contrary to public reports, there are a number of efforts and initiatives from this last session of which this chamber may be properly proud. Members of this chamber have applied their considerable and wide experience in an assiduous and most diligent manner to ensure that legislation is carefully and microscopically analyzed with knowledgeable witnesses at the committee level. Care has also been taken to ensure that the basic thrust of government intent can be carefully defined and refined within those pieces of legislation.

Care has also been taken to ensure that legislation is such that the departments and agencies of government can execute and administer it without ambiguity or equivocation; that when there are amendments worthy of inclusion, they are considered and often included in the original tabled bills; that major, nation-wide problems are thoroughly studied by various committees and by knowledgeable and keenly interested senators with long-term experience in such matters.

On that work, this chamber is expert. It is a pity that the public, through the media, regard as of consequence only those formal sittings of this chamber which, in truth, constitute only a small segment of our work, and one that is actually a less time-consuming part of our duties.

It is most gratifying to hear from the many organizations and citizens who bring briefs and present viewpoints before our 18 standing committees and subcommittees as to how deeply they appreciate the obvious expertise, the piercing inquiry and the depth of knowledge of the members of the Senate committees who question them.

Lest the organs of news dissemination have overlooked some of the accomplishments and achievements of this Parliament, allow me to merely touch on a few in which this chamber, the other place and members of all parties may take credit, and Canadians take some comfort.

1. 600,000 new jobs have been created in less than two years. This, I believe, is more than in any comparable period in our history.

2. Unemployment, though still considerable and unacceptably high, particularly in some regions and in some economic sectors, has been reduced overall from 11.7 per cent in 1984 to 9.7 per cent in 1986. This drop exceeds the forecasts made by Brian Mulroney in his election campaign.

3. The prime lending rate has fallen from 13 per cent-plus to around 9.25 per cent, giving stimulus to the economy and helping to safeguard small and large borrowers from the fear of losing their businesses or their homes. Mortgage rates, in fact, are at less than half the peak they reached a few years ago.

4. Inflation rates have not quite been "wrestled to the ground," to requote a phrase. They have, however, dropped from highs in the 12 per cent bracket to around 4 per cent, thus saving this country from becoming a bankrupt Third-World economy.

Honourable senators, these are indisputable facts. The depressed economy of 1982-83, however caused, has been reversed and, despite pockets of economic stress, we are in an upturn of about two years' duration. Some critics may not wish to give credit to the administration or to this Parliament for the improvement. However, in that case they must not howl for the government's skin if an adverse reversal occurs. If Ottawa is blamed for recessions, is Ottawa then not equally entitled to take credit for the upturns?

I shall go on with the record. Wait for it.

5. The constantly-rising annual deficit, mounting each year from 1975 to 1984, has been reversed. The bright red ink—

Senator Stuart: Except in Saskatchewan.

• (1550)

Senator Barootes: Thank you. The bright red ink has taken on a less brilliant hue. Though many may wish this trend could be accelerated, and perhaps it shall, it must be done gradually, moderately and carefully so as not to dislocate the economic environment—which was established in the prior 20 years—upon which our people and businesses have become dependent.

6. You will stand and cheer for this one: the Minister of Finance has proven himself an outstanding example of fiscal responsibility—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Barootes: —exhibiting prudence, fairness, social sensitivity, acumen in business concerns, and has restored confidence in Canada in the international financial markets, as well as acting sympathetically to the concerns of the provinces.

Senator Stuart: I'll buy most of that.

Senator Barootes: 7. The National Energy Program, the NEP, has been dismantled, removing a huge burden from the oil and gas industry, lowering costs to consumers and giving a push to our productivity and enhancing our competitiveness in world markets.

Recent removal of the iniquitous revenue tax, the PGRT, 30 months earlier than anticipated, when coupled with the anticipated provincial royalty revisions which are anticipated, will be a welcome and timely relief to the western oil industry, especially in Alberta. It may be sufficient to avoid many bankruptcies and restore some employment in the exploration field, and this will occur as we await the fate of world oil prices in a market over which we have no control.

It is significant to note that producers in western Canada, although suffering terribly, support and praise the dismantling of the NEP and the deregulation of the industry. They prefer the freedom of the marketplace, however difficult, to the autocratic regulations of government controls.

8. In agriculture, massive assistance has been provided, usually dovetailed to matching assistance at provincial government levels. For three years agriculture has been troubled, especially the grain and livestock sectors in western Canada, not to overlook or exclude the problems of potato, sugar-beet, fruit, dairy and tobacco farmers elsewhere in Canada.

Until this year drought, plagues of insects and grasshoppers, diminishing markets, depressed and falling grain prices have combined with rapidly rising input costs that have virtually devastated agriculture on the prairies. Realizing that almost 50 per cent of my province's economy stems from agriculture and food production, you get some idea of the impact on the provincial economy.

And how has our federal government reacted to this agricultural and farm crisis? I hope that Senator Argue takes note of this: I would say magnificently and providentially. Since October 1, 1984—

Senator Stuart: Are you living in the same world?

[Senator Barootes.]

Senator Barootes: Since October 1, 1984, the federal government has legislated—

Senator Stuart: Would you answer a question?

Senator Barootes: I shall try to answer Senator Stuart's questions later.

Since October 1, 1984, the federal government has legislated, enacted and undertaken no less than 282 measures and announcements to assist farmers and farm groups across Canada. This commitment amounts to no less than $5.2 billion in aid to agriculture in Canada, not including benefits from lower interest rates. If Senator Argue would like, I will read the 282 measures, but I would like to spare other honourable senators that.

Other provinces, as well as Saskatchewan, have reacted similarly in concert with the federal government, reinforcing the assistance to ensure that every bit of help is offered to farmers whose equity by any stretch of the imagination is deemed to be worthy of survival. Farm groups, financial institutions and governments at all levels have provided splendid co-operation and support.

Without fear of contradiction, I can say that no government in the history of Canada, or in the history of Saskatchewan, has done as much for the farming sector as have these present governments in the last two years. They have literally gone to the wall for farmers, and, if I may say so, I hope those worthy people will never forget it, particularly in this year of an election in Saskatchewan.

The Saskatchewan provincial government has endured a considerable deficit, as my honourable friend knows, to ensure that farmers can stay on their land to continue farming. Our premier is prepared to go another mile, if necessary, to ensure such survival, even if it means further deficits. It is that vital to our province and to Canada as well because 60 per cent of the grain raised for export in this country comes from that one province.

Is it not ironic, honourable senators, in view of this statistic of 60 per cent of export grain being produced in Saskatchewan, that the Canadian Wheat Board, the Board of Grain Commissioners, the Rail Transportation Group, the allocation of grain cars and most if not all of the agencies involved in grain transportation and marketing are located in Winnipeg, Manitoba, a province which produces only 10 to 15 per cent of that product? Perhaps by similar logic, and somewhat cynically, I could suggest that it would make sense to locate the Saltwater Fish Marketing Board in Saskatoon.

Canada faces a difficult situation caught in the crossfire between the European Economic Community and the United States subsidization of grain exports at fire sale prices. I, like all other western listeners, and I am sure Senator Stuart, was excited and delighted that the first domestic issue addressed in yesterday's Speech from the Throne was the definite commitment "to protect the interests of Canada's farming community in the face of unfair pricing and subsidy practices conducted outside of our borders."

Senator Stuart: Great words, but I want to see some action.

Senator Barootes: I know that the details of, the extent of and the nature of this kind of support cannot be immediately specified until the harvest is completed and consultations with the provincial governments can be held, but the commitment is there, it is unequivocal and it is binding.

Senator Steuart: You are a great talker, but I want to see some action.

Senator Barootes: All of western Canada can count on federal support, and I want you to spread that good word when you get back to Saskatchewan.

Senator Steuart: I will get back to you in a minute; you are making me sick.

Senator Barootes: Already! There is more to come.

Perhaps with the opening of Parliament, something further can be done to alleviate the damage by the strike-lockout at the Lakehead which is, once again, crippling the credibility and stability of Canada as a grain-exporting country, and before we lose precious sales contracts. At noon today in Ottawa a new wheat sales agreement was signed with the Russian delegation. I am sure the west will be pleased to hear that.

To carry on with the list of parliamentary achievements not entirely recognized by the media and perhaps by some Canadians:

9. FIRA, the Foreign Investment Review Agency, or as it was known colloquially, the Foreign Investment Rejection Agency, has been replaced appropriately by Investment Canada.

10. Divorce acts have been suitably updated to meet modern social necessities, to help remove the stigma of blame and to restore a balance of fiscal responsibility between spouses. Senate suggestions were appropriately included in the legislation.

11. Discrimination in the Indian Act has been removed and the beginning of self-government restored to Indian bands. Further, the Speech from the Throne promises the convening of a third First Ministers' Conference on Aboriginal and Constitutional Affairs.

12. Seven women are now deputy ministers and a good start has been made in affirmative action programs to help provide equality of opportunity in government and in corporations who deal with government. The Speech from the Throne undertakes several further initiatives for the "advancement of women in government," for a concerted approach to child care, for the issues associated with family relationships, working parents, battered women and child abuse;

13. The federal government has developed some leaders of great ability in their fields: Joe Clark in External Affairs. Everyone is in praise of his performance as our Foreign Affairs Minister and have said that they have not been handled as well since the days of Lester B. Pearson. Mike Wilson in Finance, Don Mazankowski, Marcel Masse, Flora MacDonald, Barbara McDougall, Pat Carney, John Crosbie, Ray Hnatyshyn and our own Lowell Murray. Please note that three of these stars are ladies. A great credit to them and to the Prime Minister for recognizing their talents and allowing them to be developed.

14. In the area of interprovincial affairs and relationships with the federal government, one must certainly acknowledge a new air of cooperation, civility and respect between the provincial and federal administrations in virtually every department. Despite areas of healthy disagreement and strongly held positions, confrontational politics and misunderstandings have been replaced by wholesome discussion, mutual respect and co-ordination. For all Canadians this is a distinct relief.

15. Internationally and with the United States, our vastly improved relationships must be credited to the Prime Minister and to the Right Honourable Joe Clark. We have earned the respect of all nations and, specifically, the eyes and ears of our southern neighbour are focused upon us. The great triumph of Expo '86 has brought world attention and tourist dollars and put Canada on the map again. I might add that our Saskatchewan pavilion has been a most pleasing and popular success, already drawing over 2 million visitors, and it certainly is worth bragging about.

Although bargaining on a freer trade agreement with the United States will be tough, we have much more to gain than they have. A nation of 25 million souls, which produces far more than they can consume, cannot live in isolation, selling their goods and their services to themselves alone. We live by trade. To be excluded from a marketplace of 250 million people which is so near to us is to threaten our very standard of life by economic hara-kiri. Moreover, the status quo is neither guaranteed nor sustainable. Our present prosperity in central Canada is predicated on the U.S.-Canada Auto Pact, a bilateral agreement which can be terminated on one year's notice by either party.

With the recent American pre-election surge of protectionism and with threats vis-à-vis Canada's trade affecting steel, shakes, shingles, softwoods, hogs, beef, potash, uranium, fish—and I fear soon to be directed to other natural resources and products—how long do you think a one-year's notice on the Auto Pact can last? It is vital that we try to negotiate a mutually advantageous trade pact, as was mentioned in the Throne Speech, and make the consequent internal adjustments now in order to safeguard our standard of living and our way of life in the future. And further, I might add, we should avoid having individual provinces forfeit our bargaining chips whilst the negotiating game is in progress, as has been done recently in the negotiations on financial services.

The Throne Speech also took cognizance of the fact that this trading nation will place similar emphasis on multilateral negotiations and "particular emphasis on trade with Japan and other Pacific Rim countries."

16. Finally, on this partial list of achievements not well recognized, I include: Parliamentary reform; massive deregulation in many agencies and departments, which is promised to be extended, privatization of hemorrhaging crown corporations, and the excellent non-partisan appointments of competent people such as Stephen Lewis, Ian Deans, Dennis McDermott, Ambassador Francis and—

Senator Steuart: I don't believe it! Even you don't believe that!

Senator Barootes: —others to important posts.

Senator MacEachen: What about McDermott?

Senator Barootes: I knew you would be pleased.

More has already been accomplished and legislated by this Parliament in two years than in the four-year lifetime of almost any previous Parliament.

Senator Steuart: Remember who appointed Duff? That wasn't a man appointed by Trudeau? What about that one?

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, let me turn for a few minutes to Saskatchewan, where we face a provincial election on October 20.

Senator MacEachen: No politics in the Senate.

Senator Barootes: I know you will do very well with your party, senator.

Senator MacEachen: That's what everybody has been telling me since I came.

Senator Barootes: Our major industry, agriculture, has suffered badly for three years. If these fall rains would cease, and if we had a fine Indian summer free of frost, we could harvest a record crop with pretty high grades.

Senator Steuart: And no prices!

Senator Barootes: Such a crop in prior years would have meant unprecedented prosperity.

Senator Steuart: If we had Liberals in, they would get a very good price.

Senator Barootes: But very low prices, high input costs, poor export markets ravaged by the American-European trade wars—and plagued once again by strikes and lockouts at the Lakehead—will make for—

Senator Steuart: Why don't you end it, then?

Senator Barootes: —very poor cash receipts. Governments will have to continue to help.

Some other export commodities are also down: Linked to grain surpluses, our potash sales are down in volume and in price, reduced to less than half the 1981 price. Uranium sales are buoyant, but price per pound was markedly reduced to one-third its peak. Oil activity and revenues have greatly sagged this year.

In spite of these vagaries of the international commodity markets, to which traders must adjust, our greatest strength lies in the hardiness and resilience of our people. They have endured cycles of depression before in the thirties and even since, and always have been hopeful. We remain strong in will and confident of the future. There are some good signs: record crops; plenty of moisture this year; good and rising prices in the red meat area, with plentiful cheap grain; growth in our mining industry with considerable gold play and a new gold-mine coming into production. The government has helped sustain agriculture through its toughest years, has seen fit to protect home mortgages and to control utility and energy costs. They have encouraged private investment with legislation of a Saskatchewan Stock Savings Plan similar to the one in Quebec, and with venture capital funds. They have begun privatization of crown companies with the sale of several such companies. In the area from which my friend Senator Steuart comes, Prince Albert Pulp, a crown company which was a heavy loser, has been sold to Weyerhaeuser Canada and they are now building our first paper mill in Prince Albert. This has restored the confidence of the private sector industries.

I could go on—

Senator Steuart: You shouldn't.

Senator Barootes: We have a new Gainers plant in North Battleford; a huge expansion of Intercontinental Packers with 1,200 new jobs in Saskatoon; a recreational vehicle manufacturing plant employing 400 people in North Battleford—and this becomes a part of the largest recreational vehicle and sports sales outlet in all of Canada; a $650 million heavy oil upgrader in Regina; a new pharmaceutical manufacturing plant in Wolesely, and many public projects in education, nursing, hospital and senior citizens institutions. Regina will get a new major convention centre and hotel. Industry and private investment have once again found their way into Saskatchewan.

For the past several years we have had the lowest unemployment figures in Canada, although for the past five months the economic boom in Ontario has placed us in second. This improvement in our general economy, coupled with the numerous commercial industrial and construction projects in my province, has given us record job creation and has even created a shortage of tradesmen in the construction industries.

The government's initiatives have therefore been rewarded. Premier Grant Devine's thrust has been to stabilize the agricultural industry and to diversify the other aspects of our economy. The agricultural sector is being stabilized by avoiding the cycles of drought through water and irrigation projects in cooperation with the federal government. The diversification is in the projects I have mentioned, as well as in technology; in fibre optics—of which Saskatchewan has the largest network in Canada in research and development; in mining, electrical and small manufacturing; in agricultural implements; in modernization of our steel and pipe plants; and in the recent announcement in Saskatoon of an electrical generator manufacturing plant by Hitachi-Marubeni of Japan, whose plan is to export these products throughout North America.

The future, indeed, looks promising and the return of the same government will bring more projects and a more stable base to our economy.

[Senator Barootes.]

Some specific measures are worthy of note. First, a recent announcement of a stable, ten-year mortgage rate, guaranteed at 9.75 per cent, removes the concern and anguish of homeowners that fluctuating mortgage rates might result in the loss of their most precious investment, their home.

Second, a home improvement grant program resulted in an unbelievable response with thousands of phone calls and take-ups in the past three weeks. The Saskatchewan Housing Corporation could barely keep up with the calls, in spite of additional phones and personnel. It is expected that 4,000 small-construction workers will be kept busy this winter, that is, 4,000 people who would otherwise go on unemployment insurance.

Third, a social program that this Progressive Conservative government has initiated, which is very popular, consists of a provincial voluntary contributory pension plan for small-business people, for their employees, for housewives and others who are not fully enrolled or fully eligible for other pension plans. The interest is intense. The overflow crowds at meetings to explain the plan throughout Saskatchewan attest to its acceptance and popularity.

Just as a former Saskatchewan government of CCF political persuasion introduced hospitalization and then medicare, which were subsequently copied in other provinces to become a national reality—

Senator Frith: Is this the proposed Speech from the Throne for Saskatchewan?

Senator Barootes:—so I predict that this pension plan program will ultimately be copied in other provinces, because they are already making many inquiries. It is wonderfully attractive and is particularly aimed at those with low-income jobs, small businesses, self-employed or those who work at home without compensation such as housewives.

I apologize to the Deputy Leader of the Opposition for taking some of the honourable senator's time to talk about my province, as well as the accomplishments of both governments, past and present, but perhaps he will forgive me that small venial sin on the occasion of our forthcoming election.

Senator Frith: It is not up to me to forgive your sins.

Senator Barootes: My honourable friend is worthy of forgiveness.

My dear and honourable senators, it is trite and true to say that Canada has serious financial problems, in spite of our outward and seemingly high standard of living. We have managed to burden ourselves with a crippling and enormous national debt—perhaps in the area of $250 billion to $300 billion before this Parliament's life expires. That amounts to about $10,000 or more per man, woman and child. Governments are squeezing almost 50 per cent of our gross domestic product to continue their programs and to service this debt. We do not have the luxury of corporations with the ability to declare bankruptcy, nor can we eschew our debts, whether we owe them partly to our own people or to foreign lenders.

Perhaps in the past we spent unwisely. Perhaps, as some economists say, we went too fast and too early into a mature social security network before our country was adequately populated and sufficiently developed to provide a solid fiscal and industrial base. Perhaps as governments, eager to develop a base and to provide jobs, we overindulged our industries with financial assistance. Whatever the cause, the result is crystal clear. We have an enormous debt and huge annual interest charges to defray; charges which seem to grow annually. In fact, we are now expending almost three times as much for the interest charges on our debt as we are spending on unemployment insurance. In industry terms we are actually showing an operating profit, that is, a bottom-line before debt charges, but our debt charges virtually account for our annual deficits.

Perhaps we followed the first half of the Keynesian theory of economics and failed to heed the second half. We undertook to spend our way out of our recession by federal deficit spending. So, in 1975, when Canada was in a recession, it seemed sensible to assume a deficit of $3.8 billion. But we forgot the second part of that economic theory whereby, in good times, the government should accumulate a surplus to reduce the debt and leave room for the private sector borrowers to have access to scarce funds as the country approaches capacity of production. Unfortunately, we failed in the good years of 1976 to 1979 to do this. In fact, we continued to increase our federal spending by almost threefold and our deficits by tenfold.

It is a difficult predicament, because no one is prepared to reduce our federal spending precipitately and, in fact, to do so would bring chaos and dislocation to our economy. No one is prepared suddenly and greatly to increase taxes to make up that deficit, because it is not only politically suicidal to do so but also because it would stifle private industrial and capital expansion wherefrom come the majority of new jobs.

It little profits us to curse our lot and to try to find someone to blame for our present situation of debt. The policies that led to it were taken in a proper manner and in good faith by a duly- and democratically-elected government and by the Parliament of Canada. To blame each other or to find scapegoats does not help the situation or solve the problem. There will be time enough for that in the next election, and the people of Canada can make their judgment at that time.

However, it is important in the meantime, dear friends, between elections, for all of us in this Parliament to bring our best brains and our best efforts forward in co-operative harmony to help extricate Canada from this overhanging debt problem and to do so without aiming for partisan political advantage, without name-calling, whether we are Liberals, New Democrats, Progressive Conservatives or Independents. In such a difficult situation, I would take the advice of the devil himself if it were helpful to my situation.

What better place for sound and non-partisan advice of that nature than this Senate, abounding with talent and experience in legislative, constitutional and fiscal matters; this chamber where we are not so subjected to the changing whims of the electorate every four years?

So, my colleagues, I pray that we and the members of the other place can and will, in this period of fiscal peril which we have inherited from our preceding legislators, put aside, for the present, our political prejudices and work together as diligently as we can, not for the good of our party, our province or our government, but dedicated entirely to the good of our beloved country and its 25 million Canadians.

Honourable senators, the Speech from the Throne outlined an architectural blueprint for this Second Session of the Thirty-third Parliament that is all-embracing, and if we apply ourselves industriously and conscientiously to our task, we can renew and reconstruct the Canada of our dreams.

The national reconciliation program should be fully acceptable to all people. Who can quarrel with consultations with the provinces on the Canadian Charter of Rights and the Constitution that could lead to the full assent of Quebec? Who could object to updating the 17-year old Official Languages Act to have it conform to the Canadian Charter of Rights, or to updating the 50-year old National Parks Act?

The triad of economic renewal, social justice and constructive internationalism contains many initiatives which I heartily support.

The economics package, aside from trade issues which I have mentioned, undertakes further and comprehensive tax reform based on fairness, simplicity and a "balance between personal income and other taxes" such as those for corporations. This has long been advocated by many economists and various politicians. Canadians and business people will welcome a reduced burden of paperwork and regulations, the promotion of small business entrepreneurial values, especially among youth, the removal of barriers to interprovincial trade and further privatization of crown corporations. Maritimers and westerners will applaud the deregulation of the transportation sector which has brought a handicap of distance to their industries. And those two distant regions, the west and the east, are hopeful that the "new approaches to regional development" are designed to give them a fairer shake and fairer treatment. I praise the emphasis on diversifying western Canada's economic base, and I know that the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency with local input will be well received by those worthy people, and that they will applaud the improvement of small craft harbours in fishing areas.

Our Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will be profoundly interested in the proposed new framework for the financial services industry, in the Estey report and the concern expressed generally about the concentration of corporate powers.

Many in this chamber will be exhilarated and delighted with support committed to post-secondary education, the initiative for $1 billion of new funding for scientific and university research and the motives behind a national advisory board for industrial technology.

Nationalists, peace lovers and scientists will praise the establishment of a Canadian space agency designed for peaceful purposes. It could even help stop our brain drain in this industry.

[Senator Barrootes.]

In the agenda proffered on social justice, I will deal with only two additional areas, the first of which is Canada's drug abuse epidemic. Public health epidemiologists classify an epidemic as a disease affecting 2 to 4 per cent of the population of an area or region. Is there anyone here who does not believe that more than 3 or 4 per cent of our people are victims of this disease of the abuse and misuse of addictive drugs? This is worse than an epidemic, fellow senators, it is a national calamity. It affects millions of people and their families. It can no longer be a hushed-up or closet problem. It must be faced. As a doctor once involved in the Drug and Alcohol Abuse Council in Saskatchewan, I am most gratified that the Throne Speech states that:

A national drug strategy and a comprehensive program dealing with impaired drivers will be brought forward to support the prevention of drug and alcohol abuse.

Second, in the area of social affairs, I am sure that Senator Haidasz, Senator Bosa and others will be pleased to hear that legislation to simplify and improve the process of determining eligibility for political refugee status is to be presented. Further, and something that will be of special interest to Senator Bosa, our ethnic groups will be encouraged to use the entrepreneurial skills that they have so that these skills will be more fully enhanced and utilized in our economy.

The third leg of this stool, of course, was the subject of constructive internationalism—that of preserving world peace and security. Our credibility as an independent and influential voice in these matters—in arms control, disarmament and nuclear verification—is highly recognized through efforts initiated by Lester Pearson, expanded by Pierre Trudeau and advanced by Joe Clark. Our sensitive and sensible initiatives as peacekeepers in the Commonwealth, in NATO and in the South African question have gained respect and attention and have helped defuse many explosive situations.

Honourable senators, the Throne Speech contains more than 45 new initiatives and proposals. Its programs are widespread and will address the needs and desires of many interest groups, national, regional and minority groups. It will touch upon and affect every individual in Canada. The government has listened and responded to their needs and representations.

How these desirable objectives are specifically to be attained will be disclosed in the days to come by ministerial statements and by tabled legislation. We will then have the opportunity and the duty to scrutinize and debate the issues raised once they have been defined in more detail.

I thank honourable senators for their indulgence and attention to these remarks. For the many reasons I have outlined, I have the honour, privilege and pleasure to second the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Hon. D.G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I really hadn't thought that I would enter into this debate, and I am not going to enter into it at any great length. I would first like to state that I got into politics shortly after the Second World War. The only reason I got into politics was because, when I returned to Canada, we in Saskatchewan had elected a CCF government. The head of that government was Tommy Douglas and his second in command was C.M. Fines. If ever there was anybody who could twist the truth and peddle the garbage—and be backed up by someone who twisted the finances and peddled the garbage even better than he could—it was Tommy Douglas. But never up until now have I heard anybody who has done a job almost equal to what Tommy Douglas and C.M. Fines did. Never have I heard their equal until I listened to my friend, Senator Barootes, talking about what is happening now and what has happened in Saskatchewan.

I never thought I would see this day and hear those remarks from a man who joined me at one time in defeating the CCF government. The members of that government positioned themselves as friends of the people. That government was made up of people who never said a wrong word or put their foot down in the wrong place. That government was only ever helping the people. In fact, as Senator Barootes well knew, what that government was doing was helping its friends, helping itself and putting the people of Saskatchewan deeper into the hole. In fact, there used to be a sign on the borders of Alberta and Manitoba which said, "Would the last person who leaves Saskatchewan please turn out the lights." Honourable senators, that is a fact.

Today I have listened to someone talk about the present government of Saskatchewan and the Government of Canada as if those governments had never set a foot down wrong—as if everything they had done was for the benefit of the people. Honourable senators, the people of Saskatchewan have never, even under the NDP government, been in more trouble than they are today. And I might tell honourable senators that when the Government of Saskatchewan took over, its representatives used to boast. Grant Devine—who is a friend of mine, and I like him—used to boast: "We are going to bypass the depression of Canada. We have decided that we will not take part in Canada's recession. We have less unemployment, we have more prosperity, and more of the good things than they have seen anywhere else in this country." That was a year and a half ago, and during that same period, a year and a half or two years, they have overspent by something like $2 billion.

I would like the senator to realize that never in the history of Saskatchewan, until we elected the Grant Devine Conservative government, had we ever had a deficit—never under the old Liberals; and never under that unbelievable Tory government that we had from 1929 to 1934—which was half Tory and half Ku-Klux Klan. Even under the wild CCF, the crazy CCF, the Tommy Douglas CCF, did we ever have a deficit. Certainly, we had never had a deficit under the Thatcher government. Even when Allan Blakeney came back in 1971 and knocked us out of the ball park we did not have a deficit. Then we got Grant Devine and the Conservatives. We then had the two best years we had ever had in the history of Saskatchewan, and we started to build up the deficit. Now it is $2 billion. They are going to win the next election!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Steuart: Thank you very much for applauding. You love them because you are a left-winger. I am surprised that the honourable senator would love them, because he used to term himself a middle-of-the-road right-winger. Now we are going to have a Conservative government. Why? The other day I said to a bunch of Conservatives—

An Hon. Senator: Will you vote for them?

Senator Steuart: No, I am not going to vote for them. You might, but I won't. I said the other day to a bunch of Conservatives: "You Conservatives are beautiful. I have never seen Allan Blakeney so off base. I have never seen him react so badly to an election." They said: "Thank you very much, senator, this is wonderful. Why do you think we have done it?" I said: "Because he finally met a bunch of characters who are more goofy than he is." They are spending more money than they ever thought of spending. They have taken his turf. There is no turf left for the CCF. There is no room left for the CCF. Grant Devine has plunged our province into $2 billion worth of debt, and in this election campaign he is not just promising, he has already spent another half a billion dollars—and the honourable senator knows that as well as I do. So, don't tell this Senate or the Canadian public that it is a good government. It is a government like the one we have in Ottawa, that will do anything, say anything, make any move to get back in power, and the honourable senator should be ashamed of himself that he would be part of that government, that would plunge—

Senator Barootes: Is this a question?

Senator Steuart: It is not a question. I am making a speech, for God's sake. If you do not understand what a speech is, then you do not understand anything. You made a speech. I have never in my life been so sickened by a speech. You talk about what the federal government is doing for the farmers. What are you doing for them? You are carrying on Otto Lang's deal, which you opposed—which every Tory in the House of Commons opposed—in connection with the stabilization program, which has given Saskatchewan farmers $1 billion. You have now promised something weak in the Throne Speech. You say that you will do something better. I do not know what it is. I hope it is something better. As a Saskatchewan man, I hope it is something, and Grant Devine is praying that it is something.

I had not intended to speak today, but when I heard the honourable senator speak, I was never in my life so disappointed or upset by what he said—never mind making the sign of the cross or making some of those cheap remarks. I have never been so disappointed to hear anyone praise the lack of action for the people on the prairies and then praise what Grant Devine and this government has done in spending to the extent that our little province, of less than one million people, now has a deficit that his grandchildren and my grandchildren will never be able to pay off. They have done everything—and the honourable senator knows this as well as I do—to buy this election—and, unfortunately, I have to believe that they have bought it. I have to believe that you have this fellow Blakeney so upset that he cannot even outpromise you. As someone said to me the other day: "Our people are spending the money.

Blakeney is just promising something." How the honourable senator can stand in this chamber and in any public speech condone what they have done is beyond me.

What they are doing in Saskatchewan—and they will be elected; I know they will be elected—is a disgrace, and we will pay for it from now until far beyond after the honourable senator and I have died. What is even worse, they have set a precedent that will exist in large writ on the screen of political science to say: "If you want to get re-elected, just shovel it out and give the people anything they want; spend anything you want, and never mind what it is." If the honourable senator thinks that the poor people will benefit from this, then he is mistaken.

Do you know what was the last thing they handed out? They said to the people: "If you want to build a home, or fix it up, we will give you $10,000 at 6 per cent interest; and if you spend $10,000, we will hand you back $1,500"—and they are giving it to them right now, handing out $1,500. What can the people do with that $1,500? They can build a swimming pool or a jacuzzi, they can put down new rugs; they can wallpaper their house—they can do anything they want. Do you know what they are now doing? They are saying to people who are building a house: "Stop building when you have got within $10,000 of the end of the house." People say: "We will go to those goofy Tories in Regina and we will say: 'We have finished the house, but we have not finished the bedroom, the bathroom or the kitchen, but we need 10,000 more bucks.'". On a mortgage they were paying 15 per cent, and they say: "These Tories, to get re-elected, will give us the money at 10 per cent, and when we spend $10,000 they will give us back $1,500 cash." They have bought the people of Saskatchewan, and the honourable senator, a Conservative, whom I always admired as a small "c" conservative, has the intestinal fortitude to stand up and boast about what they are doing. They should be ashamed of themselves and you should be ashamed of yourself. I hope they will be defeated, but I do not think they will be.

On motion of Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 7, 1986, at 2 p.m.

THE LATE HONOURABLE PAUL YUZYK

TRIBUTE

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I heard the news of the death of our colleague, Senator Paul Yuzyk, when I was in Saskatoon last July on a tour of the Canadian provinces. I heard the sad news from students at the University of Saskatchewan. In a way, it was appropriate that I should be in that city. Shortly before, Senator Yuzyk had been invited by the President of the University of Saskatchewan to talk about the report of the Special Senate Committee on Youth. If I am not mistaken, that was the last speech of his public life. And according to what I was told by the President of the University and especially by the students, Paul Yuzyk made an absolutely remarkable speech. It was passionate and courageous and it made a lasting impact on the students and professors who had the privilege of listening to the senator. A young female student told me: "I will never forget that speech by a 70-year-old senator who was living proof that in Ottawa there were still politicians who were truly aware of the problems of youth in the 80s".

I didn't hear that speech but I heard the one the senator gave in the house on the same subject on March 18 of this year. That day I was perhaps more sensitive than usual, but I must admit that Paul Yuzyk's speech on the Special Senate Committee's report on youth was particularly moving. I had no idea, however, that we would never hear Paul Yuzyk again in this house.

[English]

Several of you paid tribute to Senator Yuzyk when the Senate sat on July 24, while I was touring the country, so I will not reiterate the list of his accomplishments. You already know of his contributions to multiculturalism, to education, to Parliament and to our nation. But I must express my deep regret at the loss not just of a fellow senator but of a friend with whom I have had the honour to work closely in recent years.

Paul Yuzyk, as you know, was deputy chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Youth. He and I, with several of our colleagues, spent many weeks travelling together throughout Canada to conduct public hearings, and we worked together to organize the business of the committee and to produce our report. Senator Yuzyk brought to our task a passionate concern for the problems of Canadian youth and he shared that passion with hundreds of young people across Canada. He also shared his wealth of experience as an educator and as a participant in the political process. He brought with him wisdom and intelligence and a deep and serious concern for the problems of others.

I recall that Senator Yuzyk was ill during part of the time we were travelling last year. He would not yield. He continued with our gruelling pace—participating in hearings all day, meeting with young people during lunches, then flying to another city and working late in the evening. His selfless dedication earned him my deepest respect and admiration.

I shall sorely miss Senator Yuzyk's contribution to the work of the Senate. I shall always remember him for his honesty and integrity and his proud devotion to the causes he held dear. I am thankful for having had the opportunity to work so closely with a very noble man.

FISHERIES

INTERIM REPORT OF COMMITTEE—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, October 9, 1986, I will call the attention of the Senate to the Interim Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries tabled in the Senate on October 2, 1986.

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY FISH MARKETING IN CANADA

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, October 9, 1986, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries be authorized to examine all aspects of the marketing of fish in Canada, and all implications thereof;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject before the Committee during the 1st Session of the 33rd Parliament be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee report no later than September 15, 1987.

CANADA PETROLEUM RESOURCES

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-5

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, October 9, 1986, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-5, An Act to regulate interests in petroleum in relation to frontier lands, to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and to repeal the Canada Oil and Gas Act, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to raise a point of order. Senator Frith raised this same point the other day. Can you refer a matter to a committee that does not exist?

Senator Doody: Well, there are two items here. The important one is that I am not referring anything to anybody: I am giving notice that on Thursday I will move that motion. If the committee has not been restructured by that time, then I will stand the motion and wait until such time as it is duly constituted. In any event, I am simply giving notice that this matter is back on the agenda of the Senate. It is a bill that we knew in its previous incarnation as Bill C-94, I think, and we had done some study on it in that committee, and in its new form it will be available soon for reference to that committee. When the committee is constituted, we will make the necessary motion.

CANADA-NEWFOUNDLAND ATLANTIC ACCORD IMPLEMENTATION

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL
C-6

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, October 9, 1986, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-6, An Act to implement an agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador on offshore petroleum resource management and revenue sharing and to make related and consequential amendments, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

Senator Frith: That is the old Bill C-94.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

LABOUR

BRITISH COLUMBIA LONGSHOREMEN'S LOCKOUT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to direct my question, respecting the longshoremen's lockout which commenced in Vancouver in the last few hours, to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

[Senator Doody.]

Could the Leader of the Government bring us up to date on the status of this particular matter? Perhaps he can advise us whether or not the federal government has appointed or intends to appoint a mediator to deal with this problem and, if so, when.

I am sure the Leader of the Government realizes that this matter is of particular importance to the prairie economy and, more specifically, to the grain farmers because of the strike-lockout that has been in effect in Thunder Bay for the last four or five weeks.

In any case, the Minister of Labour has today sent a telegram to the Maritime Employers' Association asking them to allow the dispatch of longshoremen to load the grain ships in Vancouver and Prince Rupert. If that permission is granted, the situation with regard to grain exports will be considerably eased. If it is not granted, the government will have to consider what its next step should be.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps Senator Olson is about to ask the same question, but I should like to ask for an explanation of what the government leader said about mediation.

Why would the container clause not lend itself to mediation? I am not suggesting that it would, but I want to understand what the Leader of the Government meant when he said that it might not.

Senator Murray: I was thinking in terms of the dispute in Thunder Bay which has just been settled. That involved a number of issues as between management and unions.

In this instance, it seems to be a case of a confrontation where both sides have taken a very strong position. If my friend saw the news last night, he would understand what I mean. Each side has taken a pretty rigid position and it is not clear that there is any middle ground to be found.

Senator Olson: Am I correct that the Leader of the Government mentioned that the Minister of Labour either had requested or was in the process of requesting something from the unions?

Senator Murray: No, from the Maritime Employers' Association.

Senator Olson: I take it he is seeking acquiescence so that the loading of grain may be permitted even while the lockout is under way, because problems relating to containers could continue for quite some time.

Is it a fact that the unions have already indicated a willingness to continue loading grain while this lockout is in progress and while the dispute in relation to other matters continues?

Senator Murray: That is true. The union leaders have indicated that they will be prepared to move the grain.

Senator Olson: Does the government have any position—perhaps, if it does, it is not willing to state it at this time, and, if that is the case, I understand it—by which to ensure that the loading of the grain continues now that the workers seem to be disposed to do so? In other words, is the government ready to legislate an end to the lockout for that purpose?

Senator Murray: It was against the background of the statement by the union that the workers were prepared to move the grain that the Minister of Labour sent the telegram, to which I referred a few minutes ago, to the employers asking them to facilitate this course of action. As I have said, if they refuse to do that, we will have to consider what our next step will be. Obviously, parliamentary action would be one of the options.

TRANSPORT

CLOSING OF CN SHOPS, MONCTON

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and it too applies to mediation. Has he anything to report to the Senate regarding the negotiations or mediation between CN and the unions at Moncton?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I regret that I have nothing further to add to what I said last week. I will undertake to check with the Minister of Transport to see if there is anything further that can be reported on that matter.

Senator Thériault: Does the Leader of the Government know that a mediator has been appointed?

Senator Murray: Well, that does not change my situation. I have no further report from the minister or from a mediator on the matter. When I have further information, I will communicate it to the house.

Senator Thériault: Thank you.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN GRAIN FARMERS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have been following with interest the statements made in the other place with regard to the proposed deficiency payment to western grain farmers. Can the government leader indicate, from deliberations regarding this policy, whether it is to be a one-shot affair due to an emergency that exists now or whether consideration is being given to a longer term plan which would provide income support to farmers in the future, if conditions are as bad then as they are now? Is this merely consideration of a deficiency payment at this particular time?

vened a meeting of deputy ministers of agriculture on Thursday next to discuss further and to define the assistance package that was contemplated in the joint declaration of ministers of agriculture last August 27. The Minister of Agriculture will also be meeting in a matter of days with Canadian farm leaders to define the elements of that package.

Senator Argue: Can the government leader indicate where we are with regard to the Prime Minister's commitment of April 30 last that, subject to a recommendation from a committee of the House of Commons, there would be put into effect a two-price system for wheat that could go as high as $11 per bushel? The committee recommended $10 and the farmers are still waiting for the fulfilment of what I believe to have been a clear commitment by the Prime Minister that there would be an increase in the two-price wheat system.

Senator Murray: I believe that the honourable senator is referring to an increase in the domestic price of wheat.

Senator Argue: That is correct.

Senator Murray: I believe that price is now of the order of $7 or $8 per bushel. The matter of a further increase is still under consideration.

Senator Argue: Do I take it from the minister's answer that an announcement on this matter could be forthcoming? Can he assure us that the $1 billion being considered is not tied in with the two-price wheat system—in other words, that there will not be an announcement of $200 million that will be taken off the $1 billion—or is this all part of one package that the government is considering?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, an announcement will be made about any increase in the domestic price of wheat when a decision is taken. With regard to its relationship to the assistance package now being discussed between the federal government and the provinces and with farm groups, that package, I repeat, has yet to be defined.

It is the position of the government that it will not be reallocating moneys from existing farm programs; but, of course, we reserve the right to use existing legislation to deliver the enhanced cash flow that we have in mind.

Senator Argue: I have a supplementary question for the government leader. If it is not too presumptuous of me, I would like to ask him if he will convey this idea to the people who are considering this policy. I hope that the announcement of a deficiency payment, if on bushels of grain, will not be an open-ended announcement that goes to the totality of the production of every grain farmer. I believe that the time has arrived that government policy should consider giving economic support to family farms and use the increased amount of money that would be saved in having some kind of cut-off or limit on the total production for a given unit that would receive such payments. I put that to the Leader of the Government, because I consider it to be a major element of public policy that should be addressed. I do not often refer to American policies, but they do have a ceiling on their payments and I believe that some kind of ceiling should be considered by the Canadian government in order that the average family farm might receive more assistance.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will undertake to convey those representations to the responsible ministers.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to have a little more explanation, or perhaps the Leader of the Government would give an undertaking to provide further explanation on the one positive statement that he has made. He said that the $1 billion would not be part of the obligations the government already has under existing programs, although it may use the vehicle of those programs to deliver the money.

Do I take it that the $1 billion is in addition to whatever the government may be obliged to pay out under the Crop Insurance Program and the Western Grain Stabilization Program; that it is not simply part of those obligations but money over and above those obligations—obligations which the government already has to meet?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the goal is to enhance the cash-flow of the farmers affected by approximately $1 billion. Our statement is that we are not reallocating money from other farm programs, but we reserve the right to use existing legislation to deliver the enhanced cash-flow.

Senator Argue: In other words, it is new money, additional money.

Senator Olson: There is new money to meet the obligations which the government has respecting the Western Grain Stabilization Program, for example. There is a formula already in existence that requires a payment to be made under certain conditions, such as a decline in the cash-flow to the farming community. That is what I am curious about, namely, as to whether it is money in addition to that which the government is obliged to pay out now because of the formula that calls for such payment. I take it from the minister's explanation that it will be money in addition to the obligations relating to existing programs.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is getting into a good deal of detail. I would want to examine this question closely, and, of course, I shall refer it to the Minister of Agriculture. The details of the program of assistance will be made available in due course, as soon as they are settled.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

REQUEST FOR TEXT OF TELEX FROM PREMIER OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, a question which I know is dear to his heart because it has to do with the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. Apparently some questions were asked of the Prime Minister in the other place about this agency, whereupon he pulled out of his hat a telex from the Premier of Prince Edward Island and began to quote from it. I understand that he did not have the permission of the premier to quote from the telex, and I understand that he did not table the telex after quoting from it.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate procure for us the full text of that telex so that we can read the views of one of the premiers of the great provinces in Atlantic Canada as to the value of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency? The one paragraph that was read into the record of the other place sounds terrific. Perhaps, if we heard the other paragraphs, we in Atlantic Canada could support it as strongly as does the Prime Minister of Canada, whom I would like to give a boost to as well, but not until I see what the premier had to say in whole, not merely in part. I am quite sure that the Premier of Prince Edward Island would be pleased to have it released in its entirety.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have seen the telex in question because the Premier of Prince Edward Island was good enough to send me a copy. While I do not have it in front of me and, therefore, cannot table it immediately, I can tell my friend that it was as positive in tone as the Prime Minister indicated, and that it went on to make some positive suggestions as to how we might proceed to establish and operate this agency. However, subject to the conditions that the honourable senator has mentioned, I shall attempt to table a copy of the telex in the Senate in a day or so.

Senator Bonnell: Thank you. That is the kind of leadership we want in the Senate.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Cogger, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, for an Address to Her Excellency the Governor General in reply to Her Speech at the opening of the Session.—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.). (1st day of resuming debate).

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Cogger and Senator Barootes for launching us into this debate and for their strong efforts to buttress the Speech from the Throne. I think they did as good a job as possible with the material at hand. I would like to recall the debate on the Speech from the Throne which was given two years ago. I want to recall the words uttered then by the mover, Senator Macquarrie, who spoke in that debate on November 6, 1984. After surveying the distinguished membership of the Canadian Senate, Senator Macquarrie could not restrain himself from displaying his enthusiasm at the results of the election and said, “—here I am, standing up in the only legislative assembly in this vast country which has a Liberal majority.” Well, Senator Macquarrie did a service in drawing this imbalance to the attention of the Canadian people, who subsequently acted to correct the situation. There are now in this vast country other legislatures where Senator Macquarrie can view Liberal majorities hard at work. In less than two years, Liberals were elected to govern in three provinces—Quebec, Ontario and Prince Edward Island—and substantially increased their representation in three others. Over 60 per cent of Canadians now find themselves in the enviable position of living and working under provincial Liberal governments. I think it is also interesting to note, honourable senators—to paraphrase Senator Macquarrie's words—that I am now standing in the only legislative assembly in this vast country which has experienced an increase in Conservative members since the general election of 1984. Not surprisingly, the electorate had nothing to do with, and cannot be held responsible for, this lamentable increase!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, we are now, it may be said—possibly with a certain caution—around the half-way point between two general elections—a sobering thought for a government that has dropped in public favour so precipitously in those two years. We have seen some evidence of that government's self-criticism: a big cabinet shuffle; a Prime Minister travelling from one unpleasant incident to another throughout the country; vigorous efforts to improve communications for the benefit of us poor people who are not getting the message and not understanding properly what the government is doing. This was all evidence of reappraisal and of a new start, a spurt of activity that enhanced our expectations of new horizons to be disclosed in the Speech from the Throne. Indeed, the opening of Parliament itself was delayed so that the new political craftsmen, some of whom are with us this afternoon, would have an opportunity to fashion this new masterpiece that was to constitute the fresh start for the government. But as the horizons unfolded last week in this very chamber, one could not but conclude that those craftsmen had failed in their mission, or that the delay had not been long enough and they had not had sufficient time to lift the government into a new phase or level of vision and activity.

We know, honourable senators, that the 1984 Speech from the Throne rested principally on three pillars of wisdom: reconciliation, economic renewal and renewed Canadian internationalism. Of course, this newly-discovered wisdom would result in the achievement of three historical events in the life of this government: Quebec would embrace the Constitution; the budget deficit and the national debt would cease to be a vicious circle; and a new era in our relationships with the United States would begin with the establishment of a "true partnership," to use the words of the Speech from the Throne of 1984.

Senator Frith: Someone is trying to get into the Senate, and bypass the Prime Minister.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, the pillars are still there, although somewhat in silhouette. The government displays admirable verbal continuity, but the confidence seems to be gone, the boldness is gone, the cockiness has disappeared and the government is obviously searching around for new paths to travel, in view of the experience it has had in the last year or two. One might say that the pillars are there, but the roof is caving in.

In those intervening years, the government has either reversed itself or quietly backed away from policies it had previously considered crucial. It is obvious that the United States is no longer the cornerstone of Canadian foreign policy. As I shall point out later, the United States, as the object of international interest, is hardly mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, and yesterday, in a speech made in the House of Commons, the Secretary of State for External Affairs made no reference to the importance of the United States in Canadian foreign policy. That is quite an amazing turn-around in two years.

With respect to trade, where is the ambition to secure a comprehensive free-trade arrangement with the United States? In the Speech from the Throne there is talk about a "mutually advantageous trade agreement with the United States." Just recently we signed an agreement for the purchase and sale of wheat with Russia. That is a trade agreement. So, the vocabulary is muted and the ambition has dissipated in the trade field.

A third area of deep interest is the deficit. Preoccupation with the deficit is no longer to be the obsessive goal of the government; that objective will take its place among other goals that the government has now set for itself. Finally, the solid commitment to bring Québec into the Constitution is now heavily qualified in the Speech from the Throne, as I shall attempt to point out.

Priorities and policies have become fuzzy and diluted; the government has dropped all pretensions of offering this country leadership and now offers instead an unpalatable mush of generalities. So unpalatable is the mush that has been served up that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has himself disowned the Speech from the Throne. Of course, I hesitate to point out in making that comment that an eminent journalist has told us:

Sitting in the Chamber near the Speaker's Chair was the man substantially responsible for the Speech, Lowell Murray, the Government Leader in the Senate.

Senator Perrault: The plot thickens!

Senator MacEachen: The Honourable Marcel Masse has said:

I am one of those who, if I may be allowed to have personal views, wonders what's the use of this business.

Senator Austin: Senator Murray thinks the same thing.

Senator MacEachen: If that is the confidence the government has in its own efforts, then I say, "What's the use?"

Honourable senators, no current issue has been of greater concern to us than the inability of the Canadian economy to create an acceptable level of jobs from the Atlantic to the Pacific, despite improved rates of economic growth and despite improved employment levels in certain regions of the country.

The theme was called "Economic Renewal" in the 1984 Speech from the Throne. We now have evidence of continuity inasmuch as the latest edition of that Speech makes use of the same expression. But does it still carry the same meaning, and does it carry any hope whatsoever for further and substantial reductions in the unemployment rate? The Speech from the Throne tells us nothing on that point.

The government made it clear in 1984 that the Canadian economy would ride to prosperity on two rails—deficit reduction and improved market and investment environments where the private sector would flourish. In brief, less government and more private initiative. The 1984 Speech said:

That we must deal urgently with the deficit is beyond dispute.

The 1985 budget speech stated:

This budget addresses the vicious circle of unemployment and debt . . . our debt is spiralling out of sight. If we do not show the resolve to deal with this problem the result will be paralysis of the Government of Canada.

The distinguished Leader of the Government in the Senate picked up the same theme two years ago when he participated in the debate on the Speech from the Throne. At that time he said:

Virtually every serious analysis that has been made of our economic problems in recent years has emphasized that the road to recovery must begin with an attack on the deficit.

He went on to recall the magnitude of the deficit in 1982-83, stating it was due to a failure of policy, a failure of will, a failure of follow through and a failure of performance.

Senator Murray conveniently forgot, however, the most important fact; he should have drawn to the attention of his colleagues in the Senate the fact that Canada at that time was in the throes of the worst world-wide recession experienced since before the Second World War. We are pleased and thank God that economic conditions improved in 1984 and 1985 and that the world economy has improved and Canada has benefited from that improvement in the economic performance all over the world. So it was that the Minister of Finance, in his budget speech in February of this year, could say:

We have made tremendous progress together in the past 18 months. Growth has been strong, jobs are being created in record numbers, the deficit is coming down.

Last week's Speech from the Throne echoes the same views, but what it ignores is what has gone wrong! The deficit is not coming down as the Minister of Finance said it would. The magic target of $30 billion will not be met. We are not quite "turning the deficit corner," as the Minister of Finance was proudly announcing in his last budget. The Minister of Finance has had to acknowledge a reality which he conveniently ignored while in opposition—the impact of world economic trends on the Canadian economy.

Mr. Wilson recently explained this before the Canadian Club in Toronto when he said:

[Senator MacEachen.]

As a result of lower oil prices and somewhat lower economic growth than previously foreseen, revenues this year will be $2.5 billion lower than expected.

He said there would be $2.5 billion less because of slower economic growth and declining oil prices.

We know that Canada's main trading partners have had a slow-down in growth in the first half of 1986. World oil prices have undergone a precipitous drop, and grain prices have known an equally severe decline. The Minister of Finance, and now, we hope, the government, are discovering the international economy. They convinced themselves in 1981 and 1982 that the recession in Canada was made in Canada. There is still a hang-over of that illusion in their proud boast that our economic recovery is solely attributable to their own good work. In fact, our recovery is geared to economic conditions in the United States and other major economic partners. Is it only when the winds are chilly that they come from abroad?

What the Minister of Finance should not do is whine over the fact that government revenues are affected by external forces, but he should see how Canada can participate effectively in the shaping of these forces. If ever there was a need for "constructive internationalism," to pick up the phrase used in the Speech from the Throne, that need is here now. What is the Canadian government doing to ensure that oil prices will remain stable at a level in keeping with our producing and consuming interests? Is it doing anything? Did the government understand the lesson of the 1970s when the failure of international economic co-operation enabled OPEC to disrupt the world by two dramatic oil price increases? Is the government now failing to understand that the equally dramatic fall in oil prices is designed to restore OPEC market share and, ultimately, its worldwide power? Is the government aware that low oil prices will reduce exploration outside OPEC to a point where sometime early in the 1990s—and some say before—the supply will not meet rising demand and conditions may be right for a new and disruptive surge of oil prices?

The government does not seem to understand, or clearly appreciate, that in the field of energy Canada is a microcosm of the world. The short-term benefit of low prices to the consumers pushes our producers to the brink of disaster; in a few years' time the benefit of higher prices will put the consumers in a situation which we all know too well. I regard that as the leading entry in a discussion of the oil price situation, and I say to honourable senators: If the leading industrialized countries—a select club to which the government is so proud to belong—are able to co-operate to influence the price of the American dollar, why is it that the Government of Canada is unable to rise to the no less important challenge of bringing a modicum of order to the price of energy in which we and many developing countries—exporters and importers alike—have such great stakes?

The government should dig into some recent history and see how Canada was at the forefront in the creation of the International Energy Agency and of the North-South dialogue, heavily engaging OPEC interests in the 1970s. They should practise this constructive internationalism rather than remain satisfied with costly and short run palliatives for our oil industry. They should get out and play a leading role in trying to shape events which will ultimately, in turn, shape our destiny.

I hope the Minister of Finance will continue his journey of self-discovery after his discovery of the international economy; I wish he would continue to search to see how he can influence the trends of the international economy. In addition to that discovery, the minister seems to have also undergone an interesting and intellectual metamorphosis. In his last budget he said:

The mounting burden of public debt continues to threaten our future. It is growing faster than our ability to pay. It must be controlled.

In his budget speech of May 1985 he was also expounding the virtues of private enterprise. He said:

This is a budget to encourage private initiative... Government is not only too big, it also reaches too far into almost every corner of the economy.

In February of this year, Mr. Wilson was still hanging on to the single-minded belief that deficit reduction was the key to growth and the cornerstone of sound economic management. But, in September, he shifted his ground dramatically when he said:

Further deficit reduction is imperative, but economic renewal will not be won by deficit reduction alone.

One wonders if that is not a sentence written by Mr. Dalton Camp, who has—

An Hon. Senator: Author!

Senator MacEachen:—probably superseded Mr. Hartt as the chief economic adviser of the government. So, Mr. Wilson does not now consider it appropriate to increase taxes or reduce spending to maintain the planned reduction in the deficit—a reduction not defined by the opposition but defined by the government in repeated statements as the most urgent and necessary step in achieving economic growth.

Senator Perrault: Top priority.

Senator MacEachen: Now the ground has shifted. Is it because the Prime Minister has discovered that political necessity is the dominant factor in his thinking and that economic prudence, so ably espoused two years ago by his lieutenant in the Senate, should be superseded? We all know that deficit reduction is now taking a back seat. It is certainly not in the driver's seat.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: The butler is in the driver's seat.

Senator MacEachen: Belatedly, Mr. Wilson is discovering that reducing the deficit, having less government and more private initiative is not good enough, although each in itself may be a worthy goal. If dramatic regional disparities are to be alleviated, Mr. Wilson will need more government rather than less government; more public expenditure, where it is needed, rather than less government expenditure. The Prime Minister has learned this fact. He knows what it costs to put a penitentiary in a remote riding in the province of Quebec.

Senator Austin: No, he doesn't.

Senator Bonnell: He will find that out in two years' time.

Senator MacEachen: More money. More and more people in the Atlantic provinces are saying, "Well, what is good for Manicouagan would be good for the Atlantic provinces."

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: The market mechanism, however indispensable, will not achieve some of our goals because they are not trade and financial goals; we have social and cultural goals reflecting profound moral values. That is the reality of Canadian financial policy and Canadian financial management.

Mr. Wilson is growing wiser too late. Two years have been lost as regional disparities have become more severe—certainly in the Atlantic provinces of Canada.

Mr. Wilson may be growing wiser—and probably his mind is getting broader with passing international and domestic events—but let me tell you, honourable senators, his room for manoeuvre is growing inexorably narrower. Our economic prospects remain reasonably good for the balance of the year and next year, but we cannot expect to continue to have the rate of growth we have had in 1984 and 1985. Growth is not going to be better than it was in those two years. International demand is going to be softer, or it may be softer. We know that our tax burden has increased impressively under this government. Disposable income is reported to have declined at an annual rate of 2 per cent in April and in May against a rise of 3 per cent in the previous quarter.

The scope for reducing government expenditure may still be large in those cuts hidden away in the Nielsen Task Force Report, but, as we know, the easy cuts have been made.

Mr. Wilson failed to meet his own goals for deficit reduction in the more favourable conditions of 1984 and 1985 and at a time when the government enjoyed impressive support from the Canadian people. In two years this has been dissipated. The budget performance has fallen behind the standards which Mr. Wilson set for himself.

Perhaps the Minister of Finance or the Leader of the Government in the Senate will tell us where the government is going from here. Will Mr. Wilson raise taxes again at the risk of depressing consumer demand? Will he fall behind even more in his own fight against the deficit? Will he keep blurring the issue by constantly alluding to tax reform American style without giving us the specifics of the reform so as to permit a serious and public consideration of the effects of any such tax reform?

I must say that having pored over this product, written so laboriously and carefully by my distinguished colleague across the floor, I find no insight in the speech into these vital issues. Perhaps Senator Murray himself should keep good note of his variations on the theme of deficit reduction and drop them at the appropriate time into Mr. Wilson's lap.

It is clear that the government has moved away from the economic philosophy which it enunciated two years ago. Nothing has replaced it except uncertainty caused by soul-searching and public disfavour. There is no alternative economic policy laid out as the government has moved away from its own main pillar of wisdom, and there is certainly nothing in the Speech from the Throne which indicates that we can make further progress in reducing the high levels of unemployment in this country.

I will admit—although I am not the first to do so, because Senator Barootes said this in his speech—that unemployment has been reduced from 11.7 per cent in 1984 to 9.7 per cent in 1986. That is all to the good, but I turn, for a brief moment, to the question of the regions and, particularly, to my own region, the Atlantic provinces. We know that in the last Speech from the Throne regional disparity and regional development got short shrift. It is now given sudden prominence in this soul-searching resulting from the mid-term blues. While taking part in a similar debate two years ago, I said:

... there has been virtually no mention of regional economic development ... there is no attempt whatsoever to identify or deal with regional development concerns. There is not a single mention of any commitment to reduce regional disparities.

Of course, Senator Murray pooh-poohed my remarks and said that a commitment to attack regional disparities "ought to be—and I trust, will be—a priority of the new government." I think that if Senator Murray did have this trust two years ago it was misplaced. The record of the last two years indicates that absolutely no priority has been given to regional disparity and that there has been no success in this endeavour. My own island of Cape Breton, never but a fragile part of the Canadian economy, is worse off now than it was two years ago. Unemployment levels in the Atlantic provinces, except for New Brunswick, were higher in August of 1986 than in August of 1984 and, honourable senators, Newfoundland has an unemployment rate of 21.1 per cent. Not even during the height of the recession did unemployment reach this level in that province. Anyone who says that the government has given priority to, and has succeeded in its battle against, regional economic disparity is making a mistake.

I read today in the press that a commission had stated that unemployment insurance has robbed the Newfoundlanders of their work ethic. Commenting on that, I say: What would destroy the work ethic more among any population than an unemployment level of 21.1 per cent? That is the real problem; not unemployment insurance. And those of us who know the people of the Atlantic provinces know perfectly well that if there are good, well-paying jobs available they will take the work. I lived that experience in all my time in the House of Commons. Give them the jobs and they will go to work. Don't talk to me about a work ethic with an unemployment rate of 21.1 per cent.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: Perhaps it is inappropriate in the Senate to make a political comment—

Senator Frith: Leave is granted.

Senator MacEachen:—but I cannot fail to mention the new element which the Minister of Transport introduced into the debate on regional development this past summer. When he was, presumably, questioned about development in the Atlantic provinces and when, presumably, forced to the wall in trying to defend the record of the government, he said:

It (meaning Atlantic Canada) isn't 'have not' if you compare it to Bangladesh. It's not 'have not' if you compare it to Haiti and it's certainly not 'have not' if you compare it to Jamaica.

Senator Perrault: What a statement to make.

Senator MacEachen: I regard that as an intemperate comment, which gives me the opportunity of saying that the aspiration of the people of Atlantic Canada is not to equal the standard of living in other countries such as Bangladesh, Haiti, Jamaica, West Germany, the United Kingdom or the United States. The ambition is to emulate the standard of living of other Canadians, to which we are entitled.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: When Senator Barootes talks about the distinct improvement in unemployment levels in Canada, he must know that it has principally taken place in Ontario and, probably, Quebec. It is my view that the citizens of Atlantic Canada are entitled to seek, to aspire to and to be helped to have that same standard of living. No one should say, "Well, take a look at Bangladesh," or "Take a look at Haiti," or "Take a look at Jamaica."

• (1500)

The government has indicated in the Speech from the Throne that it will establish something called the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, the purpose of which will be "to facilitate and coordinate all federal development initiatives in the area." I must say that I am not convinced that this is much of a step. What is required is not coordination and facilitation. What is required is public expenditure and public support. Indeed, no new development initiatives are mentioned by the government, although it is said that spending money by itself has not solved the problem. I agree that the problem is not solved. But, in certain circumstances, spending money from the public sector is essential in the Atlantic provinces. If it is all left to the private market mechanism, economic development will take place where it has taken place in the last two years—namely, in southern Ontario—and the Atlantic provinces will languish in high levels of unemployment. That is the reality of our situation. The government now seems to be understanding that if the regions are to prosper—not prosper but, rather, to pick themselves up out of the recession—they will need greater and greater support from the Government of Canada.

Honourable senators, I want to say just a word about Quebec and the Constitution, and perhaps Senator Murray will elaborate upon and correct my imperfect understanding of the intentions of the government. I am certainly pleased that the Speech from the Throne mentions again that our Charter of Rights and Constitution remain incomplete without the adherence of Quebec. The Prime Minister has made it abundantly clear that one of the great goals of his government would be to bring Quebec into the Constitution. In fact, the 1984 Speech from the Throne stated:

... it is obvious that the constitutional agreement is incomplete so long as Québec is not part of an accord... my Ministers will work to create the conditions that will make possible the achievement of this essential accord.

It is understandable that the government, in the ensuing months, kept away from the issue until the election of a Liberal government in Quebec. What is less understandable is that the Prime Minister should have waited so long to appoint, in the person of Senator Murray, someone responsible for meeting this great challenge. Here, again, the government seems to be in the process of abandoning the agenda which it set for itself in 1984, because this Speech from the Throne carries quite a different message on this subject from that conveyed in the 1984 speech. In the speech we heard last week, it was stated that:

Should there appear reasonable prospects for agreement, formal negotiations will proceed in the expectation that Quebec will take its rightful place as a full partner in the Canadian Constitution.

What appears to be happening is that the Canadian government is no longer prepared to throw its full weight behind the search for a solution. The government seems to be content with touching base with provincial governments to test the prospects. At best, negotiations will be initiated.

Contrast that with the other great negotiation which was to be a landmark in the history of this government. The Canadian government initiated trade negotiations with the United States and pressed ahead despite a clamour of opposition in the country. I would simply ask: Why not similar determination in the case of Quebec? Instead of determination, instead of throwing its full weight behind the effort, instead of working to create the conditions that will make possible the achievement of this essential accord, this Speech from the Throne stated: "Should there appear reasonable prospects for agreement, formal negotiations will proceed..."

Honourable senators, I must also say a word about that other pillar of the Canadian government's future; namely, constructive internationalism. That is one of the big items in the Speech from the Throne. Well, I was quite disturbed by the section on internationalism in the 1984 Speech from the Throne because the government committed itself to renewing the tradition of constructive Canadian internationalism. It highlighted the vital relationship with the United States, dealt with defence, multilateral institutions, the importance of trade and of trade liberalization. The list was rounded off with a reference to Canada's record in official development assistance and the continuing need of the developing countries. As honourable senators may recall, I said that a good deal of rewriting of history had been necessary to talk about renewed Canadian internationalism, as though that great tradition had disappeared during the years in office of former Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau—a view held, perhaps, in the back rooms of the Conservative Party, but certainly not in the great capitals of the world. I am pleased that the term "renewed" has conspicuously been dropped from the Speech from the Throne we heard last week. This government is now committed to constructive internationalism. This phrase has at least the merit of being used in the report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Canada's International Relations.

What is it, then, that the government proposes as constructive internationalism for Canada in 1986? Can we glean any new insights from the Speech from the Throne as a result of the seasoning and knowledge gained by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs from two years' experience in conducting Canada's foreign relations and after much travel abroad? Honourable senators, I do not need to repeat the highlighted areas of Canadian interest. It is the same old list as that contained in the 1984 Speech from the Throne. Are we to become any the wiser when we are told that "our foreign policy essentially rests on the respect for our engagements towards the multilateral institutions and organizations of which we are members"? I am relieved to know that Canada will continue its efforts in the Commonwealth, in la francophonie, the United Nations and NATO. But such commonplace utterances are self-evident and do not require insight or experience or travel or, indeed, much knowledge.

It is clear, as I mentioned earlier, that our relationship with the United States has lost its choice place at the top of the foreign policy agenda. We have been told under the heading of Economic Renewal that the government pursues "a mutually advantageous trade agreement" with the United States—a far cry from the historic event of comprehensive free trade. The Speech from the Throne remains silent on how the government intends to cope with the current dramatic trade issues with the United States, and with other no less dramatic issues, such as the problem of acid rain.

I wonder if the maple syrup producers of Quebec, or the forestry industry in the east, or the tourist industry—those who cherish the beauty of our land—will be satisfied with a statement in the Speech from the Throne that the government

... remains determined to pursue with the United States the rapid implementation of the recommendations of our Special Envoys with respect to acid rain.

Will that satisfy the public or the urgency of the situation?

The Speech from the Throne should also have told us what the government has done since September 1985 to protect Canadian sovereignty in the Arctic. After the humiliating episode of the voyage of the "Polar Sea" in the Northwest Passage, the government announced a series of measures designed to affirm its claim in the north, and it takes pride in rehearsing them in the Speech from the Throne. But, one year after, where is the project for a class-8 icebreaker? To what extent has Canadian surveillance been stepped up? And what is the outcome of the talks that Canadian officials and ministers have held with their American counterparts, talks which, according to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, "shall only be on the basis of full respect of Canadian sovereignty"?

I ask honourable senators whether the government, in the period of two years, has lost sight of what it said about the United States in 1984? It stated then:

Our relationship with the United States affects virtually every aspect of our national life. It is essential to our security and prosperity.

I ask why, in 1986, has this government replaced the United States at the top of its foreign policy agenda by Africa? Yes, Africa is the only continent singled out for attention under the heading "Constructive Internationalism". Of course, we know why: apartheid and famine. The government has been vocally strong in its denunciation of apartheid in South Africa, and can produce a list of approximately 27 measures adopted to demonstrate its opposition to apartheid. It has also taken forward positions on famine relief in Africa and on aid to African countries, particularly African countries south of the Sahara. We applaud and support such efforts, although I must add that under both headings the cost to Canada is not all that great.

I do not intend to deal in detail with our sanctions against South Africa, except to observe that the Minister of External Affairs told the House of Commons yesterday that in his view sanctions were generally ineffective. He seemed to be saying that we need a policy, any policy, even an ineffective policy.

I will not go into that, but I cannot pass over this government's performance in the field of aid, which is the acid test of the depth of any government's commitment to the amelioration of the condition of the poorest and least developed countries in the world.

I will return to something that I said in November 1984, following the 1984 Speech from the Throne. I had already pointed out Mr. Clark's solemn statement before the United Nations that

Our new government intends to maintain Canada's commitment to reaching .7 per cent of the GNP by 1990 in official development assistance.

That, of course, had been repudiated shortly afterwards in documents released by the President of the Treasury Board. The new target for 1990 was .6 per cent and the .7 per cent target was postponed until 1995. But even those revised figures have been superseded. The targets are currently .5 per cent until 1990 and .6 per cent in 1995. As to the .7 per cent target, it has dropped out of sight altogether. No wonder that with this downward slide the government no longer states in the Speech from the Throne, as it did in 1984, that

Canada's record in official development assistance has on the whole been constructive.

I must say, as I look at Canadian foreign policy, that it does not take much courage in this country to adopt rhetoric in favour of the poor and in opposition to racism. Canadians are universally behind such statements, so it does not require a particular type of political courage to take such a stand. But rhetoric on racism and for the poor is not good enough as a foreign policy in our day and age. What is the foreign policy now with respect to the United States? The government has been put on the run in its trade dealings with the United States. It is the most important foreign policy item, but it is not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, and it was not mentioned yesterday by Mr. Clark in his speech in the House of Commons. There was nothing about the United States. What is the policy now that the government has been put on the run in its trade conflicts with the United States?

We know, and the government should know, that the whole world is, indeed, a deeply troubled place. If Canada is to maintain its standing on the international scene, it must be ready to run the risks and incur the costs of bold policies which will truly protect its interests. Let us consider the export of arms. We should be pleased that Canada should clarify and tighten its policy; pleased that no Canadian military equipment should get to violators of human rights. But why keep the list of embargoed countries secret? Is it to protect Canadian export interests? Is it to avoid diplomatic embarrassment? The true cost of secrecy is to the government's credibility at home and abroad, and one asks whether this government is capable of facing the cost of its own decisions.

Let us also consider the problem of refugees. Let us consider the well advertised case of the Tamil refugees. Canada has been true to its long-standing tradition as being a country of asylum; but what have we done to deal not with the symptoms of trouble—the flow of refugees—but with the cause, the tensions, the intolerable situations, the breakdown in the political and social framework from which those people are fleeing?

I ask also, honourable senators, why are countries in our own hemisphere seemingly beyond the scope of our concerns? Over the years, we have had a strong and healthy relationship with the Caribbean. Has it lost favour? Is the government recognizing how dramatic is the current fate of Mexico? That is a country with which we share, along with the United States, the northern part of this hemisphere. It is a country rich in promise, a traditional friend, victim of the oil price vagaries with which I dealt earlier. It is badly in need of cooperation to surmount the problem of its staggering debt. With a 50 per cent drop in the price of oil, the national income of Mexico was reduced by 4 per cent, and its budgetary revenues were cut by one-sixth. That is what happened in Mexico. There is not a word about this, our own hemisphere, in the Speech from the Throne. Is the government insensitive to the threat of destabilization hanging over a country like Mexico, in light of the conditions I have described? I must ask: How dynamic are our ties with Latin America and how serious are our concerns with Central America if they do not even rate a passing reference in what purports to be the government's vision of Canada's role in the world?

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has put well the challenge facing anyone in charge of foreign relations. On the one hand, he said in Israel in April of this year:

—the elements of peace must be found and agreed to. Countries outside the region, like Canada, can help create conditions and provide encouragement to move the process forward.

Certainly, I would generally support that comment. The same view has been taken by our Foreign Affairs Committee, under the chairmanship of Senator van Roppen. However, more recently, in the context of Central America, Mr. Clark said that we must resist —the temptation to reduce our influence in the United States and elsewhere, by offering gratuitous advice which we can neither defend nor enforce.

I think those two statements amount to what appears to be a dilemma, but it is only a dilemma for a government without a vision of the role of Canada in the world. If the government has a vision, it pursues that vision and accepts the costs, thereby removing the dilemma which Mr. Clark stated so clearly.

I would suggest that the challenge of Canadian foreign policy is to be there in the forefront, at the right time, with a clear understanding of the Canadian interests to be served, and with the right solutions and with the influence to move them along. This can only be done with a profound vision of the world and with willingness to take the bold initiatives which have, from time to time, been the hallmark of Canadian policy. In the field of foreign policy, the Speech from the Throne offers vacuous comments and generalities. The Canadian people and the Canadian tradition deserve better.

Honourable senators, in the Speech from the Throne, the trips abroad of the Prime Minister were highlighted as an important element of constructive internationalism. Yesterday in the House of Commons, Mr. Clark stated, "We are also breaking new ground in the use we make of official trips." I would certainly agree that new ground has been broken, especially in the excessive spending and extravagant lifestyle projected by the Prime Minister abroad. I have no intention of rehearsing in full detail the painful list of these extravagances—the airborne, tea-pouring butler, who is now disguised as a security agent; the $300,000 spent to ferry a video crew to Asia aboard a Canadian Forces Hercules aircraft; the $800-a-night rooms in Paris and New York for members of the Prime Minister's staff. The list goes on. It is a painful list and I shall drop it there. This costly evidence of Canada abroad is scandalous in itself. However, there is a deeper point that has to be made. The point is that when the Prime Minister travels abroad—and he must travel abroad, and I have absolutely no complaint about that, because the Prime Minister can do a great deal for the country—the Prime Minister, any prime minister, is the country's best ambassador. So, he must travel, and I have no complaint with that at all.

However, I must say that the Prime Minister should understand that he is travelling as a representative of Canada, and that he must project in those travels the reality of life in Canada, in our own country. He must not project a false image of Canada. If restraint and cuts are the watchword of all Canadians, then that image should be projected when the Prime Minister travels abroad. We do not want two faces on this country.

I have in mind a publication which was produced, I am told, at a cost of $42,000 by the Canadian Embassy in Washington, entitled Canada Today. It perpetuates in colour photography the ill-starred Washington summit of last March. The publication and its cost are in themselves offensive to me. But the events as described surrounding that summit and disseminated at Canadian taxpayers' expense are reminiscent of a royal court at a moment of wild extravagance and imminent extinction. I would like to read a couple of things from this booklet published by the Canadian Embassy at the expense of Canadian taxpayers, particularly its description of dinner:

It was a beautiful night. Harp and string music floated out of the open doors.

This section is entitled "Bach, Tulips and Angel Hair Pasta." In it we are told, at the expense of Canadian taxpayers, the menu. It reads:

They sat at small tables adorned with pink tulips,

Senator Perrault: How about that!

Senator MacEachen:

—ate Angel hair Pasta with Seafood and Romano Cheese Sauce,

Senator Perrault: Send the bill to the taxpayer.

Senator MacEachen:

—Supreme of Chicken Vol-au-Vent and Pistachio Marquise—

Senator Haidasz: No perrogies?

Senator MacEachen:

—and drank Sonoma Couter Chardonnay, Leardini Pinot Noir, and Schramsberg Crémant Demi-Sec.

Senator Haidasz: What about Canadian wine?

Senator Perrault: Did the butler get the same thing?

Senator MacEachen: What does that have to do with foreign policy? Further on, the description ends with:

—pianist, Rosalind Tureck played, "On the departure of a Beloved Brother" in B Major . . . by Bach.

I am told that that particular selection, "On the departure of a beloved brother", was selected by the President himself as he anticipated the tariff actions which he intended to take on shakes and shingles and softwood lumber.

Those honourable senators who have a strong stomach should read this booklet and the other nonsense that is disseminated for what purpose I do not know.

Senator Perrault: Are there any pictures?

Senator MacEachen: I suggest that honourable senators take a look at the portion entitled "A Gala in a Tent". It reads in part:

The last ceremonial gala took place in a huge tent at the Canadian Ambassador's residence overlooking Rock Creek Park.

Senator Perrault: It sounds like a real tent meeting.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators may be wondering why I mention this matter. It is because Canadian foreign policy cannot have two faces. Canada abroad must be Canada at home. And what was happening in Canada when angel hair pasta was being served in Washington for our Canadian visitors? The very next day, this chamber gave third and final reading to the Family Allowance bill whereby Family Allowance payments were reduced by $11 this year for even the poorest children in Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator MacEachen: It was called restraint; we were told that Canada could not afford to give these children that $11 this year.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator MacEachen: No angel hair pasta for the children of Canada!

Senator Frith: Who paid for it?

Senator Murray: Talk about two faces for foreign policy! A prime minister who went to the Soviet Union and told them about the military threat that this country was supposed to be under from the United States. Two faces of foreign policy, indeed.

Senator Perrault: That is no defence at all.

Senator Murray: It is hard to believe that such statements could come from the foreign affairs minister of Pierre Elliott Trudeau, who, whatever his other contributions on the domestic or international scene, gained a well deserved reputation as an international playboy over 16 years in office, and that is a fact.

Honourable senators, I want to begin on a more friendly note by congratulating the Honourable Senator Cogger and the Honourable Senator Barootes who moved and seconded the motion for an Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Senator Cogger comes here with a very interesting career behind him in politics, in law and in business, and I am sure with a very interesting and constructive career ahead of him in the Senate.

[Senator MacEachen.]

[Translation]

He started his political career in the 60s at Laval University, when he was elected student president.

In the Conservative Party where he was national vice-president, as a lawyer and in the business world, he always won the confidence and friendship of his colleagues.

I have been a friend of his for twenty years. He has the grave responsibility of being the father of my goddaughter. We have travelled together across this country and abroad. We always took the same political route, although our paths may have diverged from time to time.

After working closely with the senator during the last two decades, I am delighted to see him in Parliament where, I am sure, he will make a contribution of the very highest calibre.

Senator Barootes' speech was a masterpiece.

[English]

Senator Barootes has already made his mark here as an eloquent spokesman for his region and his province, and we all understand the reasons that take both him and his interlocutor, Senator Steuart from Saskatchewan, back to their province today.

I thought that Senator Barootes' remarks on drug abuse were particularly welcome and particularly pertinent, coming as they do from a former president of the Canadian Medical Association and a former member of the Alcohol and Drug Abuse Council of the Province of Saskatchewan. It was a very wide-ranging speech that Senator Barootes made. No sooner had he mentioned the creation of the proposed new Canadian Space Agency than Senator Steuart went into orbit. In his on-schedule lift-off, Senator Steuart predicted—I think accurately—the re-election of the Conservative government of Premier Grant Devine of Saskatchewan. I, of course, have no argument with that. No doubt the NDP will come second and the Liberals will win no seats, but they will declare one of those famous moral victories that they have always had in Saskatchewan. If moral victories were members of Parliament, the Liberals would, indeed, be a formidable force in western Canada.

Let me also extend my congratulations to our newest senator, the Honourable Norman Atkins. Senator Atkins is an Ontario senator with a maritime connection, and that is all to the good. His immediate connection is with the province of New Brunswick, where he has a residence, but he had a grandfather born deep in Senator MacEachen's former constituency of Guysborough County, Nova Scotia. Senator Atkins is justly famous for his skills at recruiting, organizing, motivating and moulding a team for the achievement of political goals. This Senate being at its best a very collegial place, I know that he is ideally equipped by experience, temperament and ability to play a very constructive role here.

Senator Frith: The more time he spends here the better, that's what I say.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I want to welcome all colleagues back to their work. I trust that they have had an enjoyable holiday. Some of them have been more visible than others over the holidays. I heard the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon referring to the government's penchant for self-criticism. Judging by the situation of the Liberal party today, we still have a long, long way to go.

I was very pleased to see in the Toronto Star a few days ago an article by our colleague, Senator Marsden, on that very point. The general thrust of the senator's article was that, when Liberals are at each other's throats, that is a sign of the vitality of the party. I thought that that was a very good point. I must say I sympathize with the point and appreciate it because, in not dissimilar circumstances, I have made that very point myself, although I have never made it quite as well as Senator Marsden did, because she managed to give the thing an international flavour. She alluded to those countries where leadership review was a capital offence, and then she went on to suggest that this blood-letting in the Liberal party is somehow setting an example of freedom and democracy that the whole world can emulate. I just want you to know that I like her spirit and appreciate her style in that respect.

I also heard Senator MacEachen today taking a strong stand in favour of more government, not less government, and I could not help but be reminded of the television interviews that I saw within the last few days—indeed, last night—featuring our colleague, Senator Davey, who was drawing a pretty clear line between the various factions within the Liberal party: Those which, I take it, are represented by the present Right Honourable Leader of the Opposition and are more along the right wing, and those which belong to the factions supported by Senator Davey who would advocate a more activist role for government. I was interested to see that Senator MacEachen took advantage of the opportunity provided by the Throne Speech debate today to let us know where he stands on that matter. We shall see in November just what position he takes on the matter. I well recall the Liberal leadership convention of two years ago when Senator MacEachen took a very strong stand, indeed. Just seconds before the first ballot was taken at that convention, I saw him climb on the Turner bandwagon.

Honourable senators, mid-way through our mandate, as the Leader of the Opposition has mentioned, the Speech from the Throne—this government's second Speech from the Throne—brings a message of achievement, of continuity and of direction. The priorities that we set out in 1984 are, as the Leader of the Opposition mentioned today; economic renewal, social justice, national reconciliation and constructive internationalism. Those priorities are still before us, and in each of those areas we have real progress to show for our efforts and for the policy changes we have made. The challenge and responsibility facing the government is to build on that progress, and that is the direction set out in the Speech from the Throne.

I could hardly believe my ears this afternoon when the Leader of the Opposition lectured us on the need for concerted international action on oil prices, and to do something about the energy industry. It is hard to believe that there speaking was the author of the famous National Energy Program—officially the author, at any rate. He brought it in in the guise of a budget on, I believe, October 28, 1980. That was a policy that shut down exploration and development in the petroleum sector, that aborted the great mega-projects Senator Olson, the then Minister of State for Economic Development, was telling us were going to be our economic salvation, that shook investor confidence in Canada and led—I will never forget it—to the headline in the London Economist "Wildcat Canada Resigns from the World". Now we are being told that we must lead a concerted international action to do something about oil prices and the state of the energy industry.

Well, I am glad to have his admonitions about the need for concerted international action, and perhaps we will have another debate on that one of these days, but, in any case, I must say that, on the record, my friends opposite are ill-equipped to read us lectures on this point.

The Leader of the Opposition has also told us that the economic renewal that is taking place in Canada is a factor of growth in the United States, that the economic recession that Canada suffered in 1981-82 was purely a result of international conditions. Not a word about the budgets that he and his colleagues brought in, not a word about FIRA, not a word about the anti-investment, anti-incentive, anti-business policies that so turned off the entire business community here and abroad. Not a word about any of that.

Senator Murray: Sure, we had an international recession in those years, but it was deepened and worsened because of the actions taken by the previous government.

The Leader of the Opposition referred this afternoon to a definitive statement made by the Minister of Finance in 1984, An Agenda for Economic Renewal. Mr. Wilson identified at that time four challenges that were essential to economic renewal:

1. Get the budget deficit under control;
2. Make government more efficient and less obstructive to the work of the private sector;
3. Foster high investment, innovation, international competitiveness and a positive climate for business growth;
4. Bring about those changes with a sense of equity and openness that characterizes Canadian society.

What progress can we point to two years into our mandate? We inherited a deficit of $38.3 billion; last year it was down to $34.5 billion; this year it will be $32 billion, or less. This is the first time in 16 years, honourable senators, that the deficit has declined for two consecutive years.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: We had to put a lid on government spending. Program spending declined by about $1 billion last year, the first noticeable decline since World War II. There was an average annual growth of 12 per cent in the previous decade. Total spending came in at $2.1 billion below the target set out in the May 1985 budget, and, notwithstanding this restraint, we have been able to put more money into some important social program areas—veterans, the disabled, spouses allowance—and we have been able, notwithstanding that restraint, to respond to crises in energy, agriculture and elsewhere.

I say that speaks of good management on the part of the government. Naturally, the political leadership of the country would like to receive some credit for it, and I think we will get it, but I want to pay a word of tribute to the Public Service, which has responded to the government leadership in this respect. It has accepted the need for restraint and the need for careful management of our dollars and it deserves a measure of commendation for the results that we are receiving in this respect.

[Translation]

And for the first time in eight years, the bank rate, the inflation rate and the unemployment rate are below 10 per cent. Nearly 600,000 jobs were created since November 1984.

The OECD predicts that Canada will have the highest employment growth rate of all large industrialized countries. The prime rate of the chartered banks is the lowest it has been in eight years. Inflation has remained at 4 per cent for two years, and prices have never been as stable since 1971.

The value of construction permits, the number of housing starts, the value of new manufacturing orders, and retail sales have all increased substantially in recent months.

[English]

Two years into our mandate, what do we have to show for the policies first announced by Mr. Wilson in November 1984, and carried forward since then? As I have mentioned, the Senate and the House of Commons abolished the Foreign Investment Review Agency and established Investment Canada to encourage domestic and foreign investment in this country. We dismantled the most objectionable and confiscatory and narrowly nationalistic aspects of the National Energy Program.

What is the result? I have in front of me an article which appeared in the Toronto Star, of all places, on September 9, headed: "Tories lauded for sharp rise in foreign investment." It states:

Government figures show international investors poured $4.7 billion into Canada in the first six months of this year, close to the full twelve-month total of $5.5 billion in 1985 and almost double the $2.6 billion figure of 1984.

Industry observers say Ottawa's well-orchestrated attempt to lay out the welcome mat to the world's investors has sparked the sharp influx of capital from abroad. They also believe the flow could rise as the country's reputation as a safe haven for foreign funds grows.

"Many investors are just now accepting the fact that there is a lasting change in attitude on the part of the government in this country," Fraser Mason, head of mergers and acquisitions for Woods Gordon Management Consultants, said in an interview.

The article goes on to state:

Alan Crosby, Senior vice-president of Merrill Lynch Royal Securities Ltd., said that while much of the new investment is coming from the traditional areas in the United States, there is also growing interest in Europe and Asia.

The OECD, to which I referred a moment ago, says that our competitive position has improved considerably vis-à-vis the United States. Our overall competitive position has gone from eleventh to sixth place in two years.

The Conference Board of Canada says that consumer confidence is at its highest level in 21 years, and the second highest level on record. Last year, real gross domestic product grew at a pace second only to that of Japan and considerably stronger than that of the United States. I say simply that that is strong evidence of economic renewal, it is evidence of confidence in economic management, confidence in our economy and it points to further growth.

Honourable senators, I concede that the government pays a price in terms of its short-term popularity, for example, when it introduces restraint on spending. But people are beginning to see—and the polls are reflecting this—how restraint produces deficit reduction; how deficit reduction improves confidence in our economic management; and how confidence in our economic management spurs growth in the economy. We pay a political price from the side issues—some of which were alluded to by Senator MacEachen this afternoon—that affect and afflict every government and the media circus that accompanies those side issues. And so the opposition and some of the media are trying to manufacture a credibility issue. Members on the other side want to manufacture a credibility issue because the credibility issue is what sank them a couple of years ago. I must say that they are not doing much to improve their own credibility these days, rushing off with their own program to increase prosperity in the publishing industry. The new watchword in the Liberal Party is: If you can't say something good about somebody, write a book. We have Jean Chrétien's book and Don Johnston's book—

An Hon. Senator: Eugene Whelan.

Senator Murray: Eugene Whelan's book, Senator Davey's book, which is coming out.

An Hon. Senator: All overpriced!

Senator Perrault: At least they are literate.

An Hon. Senator: Dalton Camp.

Senator Murray: Somebody recently made a gift to me of a book called Lily, which is the second volume of what is apparently going to be a trilogy by Heather Robertson, based to a great extent on the life, times, work and diaries of Mackenzie King.

Senator Denis: It is only three out of twenty-two million.

Senator Murray: It is basically a novel, but, because it is based on Mackenzie King's life, works and writings, it is quite interesting. It is about half truth and half fiction.

Senator McElman: Have you read Sean O'Sullivan's yet?

Senator Murray: No, I haven't had much chance to read those books. I did send somebody out to look at the books—

Senator McElman: You should; it is excellent.

Senator Murray: I did have somebody go out to look at the books by Jean Chrétien and Don Johnston to try and compile a list of the references to Senator MacEachen therein because I thought that would be very interesting. I understand that his staff may be doing the same thing, so we should probably try to avoid obvious duplication of effort.

The government pays a price in these terms, but I tell the Senate that two or three years from now the government will be facing the people on the real credibility issue. The real credibility issue is whether the government has remained true to its mandate, whether the government has moved the country ahead in the right direction. I think that on the record so far this government need not fear the judgment of the people in that respect.

We had some discussion today on the subject of trade. The government will continue the fiscal and economic policies that have encouraged investment and growth and job creation, but we all know that more is needed. We have unemployment in the country, as we have been reminded today, and regional disparity. The country needs an impetus to growth and that impetus to growth can only be provided by increased trade opportunities. Hence, the government's emphasis on trade. The Leader of the Opposition professes to see some lessening in our resolve to conclude the trade negotiations with the United States. We want and are determined to get the biggest and best and most comprehensive deal we can with the United States—there has never been any question about that. We have one agenda. We have two sets of negotiations: The one bilateral with the United States and the other multilateral with the GATT. We have aggressive trade promotion policies everywhere. We send the Prime Minister and his colleagues and members of the Canadian business community abroad on these trade missions and, of course, smaller minds look at the hotel bills. But those who have some understanding will tell you that what we are doing is opening up important commercial opportunities for Canada in those countries.

I don't think I have to remind the Senate of the importance of trade or the enormous stake our country has in trade. The reports of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, under the chairmanship of Senator van Roggen, on the question of trade with the U.S. are as authoritative and as respected as any that have been issued before or since from any other quarter. We gain, and the world gains, every time we push protectionism back. However, it is appalling to see certain factions in this country still implacably opposed to a deal with the United States before any deal is struck. They demand that we stop negotiating, they reject the common sense that argues for a special trade arrangement with the country with which 70 per cent of our trade is done. They try to undermine the—Senator Frith: You are not talking about us.

Senator Murray: I am not talking about my honourable friend, no, but there are factions in the Liberal Party, now that he mentions it.

Senator Frith: Oh, in the Liberal Party.

Senator Murray: Yes, there is the Mel Hurtig Toronto Star faction of the Liberals, the Lloyd Axworthy faction of the Liberal Party—

Senator Frith: "Faction."

Senator Murray: Now my friend and his friends, Mr. Don Johnston, the Honourable Donald Macdonald and—even at his best in the old days—the Right Honourable John Turner belong to the more sensible, forward looking faction of the Liberal Party that favours—

Senator Frith: Kill them with kindness.

Senator Murray:—trade agreement with the United States.

Senator Perrault: That is the first nice thing you've ever said about him.

Senator Murray: We have unemployment in the country—tens of thousands of people coming into the labour force looking for jobs. We have regional disparities. The Prime Minister of Canada has said that every 1 per cent increase in our share of the U.S. market means 75,000 new jobs in this country.

Senator Buckwold: All in Ontario.

Senator Murray: The Macdonald commission—not all. Was that Senator Buckwold who said "all in Ontario"?

Senator Buckwold: Yes.

Senator Murray: What does the leadership in his province say about trade? They want to see us get on with this bilateral arrangement with the United States.

Senator Buckwold: We are not talking about jobs for Saskatchewan, we are talking about markets.

Senator Murray: Yes, his former colleague in the Liberal caucus, the former Premier of Nova Scotia, the former Minister of International Trade in the Liberal government has said that "Nova Scotia would be one of two provinces that had the most to gain from a new free trade arrangement with the United States."

The jobs are not all in Ontario, as I will show. The royal commission, headed by the Honourable Donald Macdonald, stated very clearly that the benefits of a free trade deal with the United States would be spread across the country and in every region. "Commissioners are confident," the Macdonald commission said, "that the long-term gains will be many times greater than the short-term adjustment costs. Such costs, moreover, can be cushioned by the introduction of an appropriate transitional adjustment assistance." The Macdonald commission went on to estimate that a new bilateral trade deal with the United States would result in a 3 to 8 per cent increase in our national income.

[Translation]

Richard Lipsey, in a study carried out for the C.D. Howe Institute, forecasts a 7 per cent increase in our standard of living and the creation of 500,000 jobs. Informetrica estimates that an increase of 5 per cent in our gross national income and the creation of 500,000 new jobs will be the result of a free trade system between Canada and the United States. The political research institute forecasts a 9 per cent increase in our gross national product.

● (1600)

[English]

This is an initiative that should be supported. Canadians want it to succeed. Trade is the key to our future growth and we need better and more secure access to that huge market in the United States. I cannot for the life of me understand why some people want us to abort it; and why they want to nickel-and-dime it to death, even before they see the shape of any agreement we might negotiate with the United States.

We have had mention this afternoon from the Leader of the Opposition of the problems of regional disparity. He has told us that it does not have the priority it used to have and that we do not have the success we used to have in terms of combating regional disparity. It was not a Conservative government that did away with DREE and drowned it in DRIE.

The Leader of the Opposition excoriates us for trying to find some new approaches to the persistent problem of regional disparity. But what is his answer? A couple of years ago in the Standing Senate Committee on Finance when we had before us as a witness Mr. Stevens, the then Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, Senator MacEachen put to him that they should keep those heavy water plants going in Cape Breton at a cost of $104 million per year on average and build up an inventory of heavy water that nobody wanted.

Senator MacEachen: It will be required in the future and it will be provided by plants built in Ontario. Mark my words, that is what is going to happen.

Senator Murray: Lord knows there is enough of it.

Senator MacEachen: There won't be any plants in Cape Breton, but they will be producing heavy water in Ontario.

Senator Murray: I want to tell my friend that there are five Candu reactor loads of heavy water inventoried in the warehouses of Port Hawkesbury.

Senator MacEachen: We all know that; that is old stuff.

Senator Murray: "Old stuff," he says.

Senator MacEachen: Yes.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator told the government that in his opinion we should keep it going.

Senator MacEachen: I still think so.

Senator Murray: From 1980-81 to 1985-86 there was no demand for heavy water, so we kept piling it up.

Senator MacEachen: Go down to Cape Breton and make that speech.

Senator Murray: Oh, I would.

Senator MacEachen: You damn well wouldn't.

Senator Murray: They kept piling it up.

Senator MacEachen: We all know that.

Senator Murray: They kept piling it up at the rate of $104 million a year, which now amounts to $624 million. The Honourable Leader of the Opposition has told the government to keep it up. He has told the government that he knows the warehouse referred to, but that there is still more warehouse space.

Senator MacEachen: Absolutely.

Senator Murray: That is irresponsible. That is the kind of attitude that gives regional development a bad name.

Senator MacEachen: You made a horrible mistake in terms of Atlantic Canada. Let me tell you that you will have heavy water being produced in Ontario, and that is plain.

Senator Murray: There is plenty of it to meet any foreseeable need.

Senator Phillips: The Leader of the Opposition is really picking on Ontario today.

Senator MacEachen: We just want to be like them. We want to be rich.

Senator Murray: The Speech from the Throne makes reference to the need—which I hope we have just demonstrated by the example I have cited—for new approaches to the problem of regional disparity. The persistence of regional disparity, despite all the efforts to improve the situation, to pour money into it, is a frustrating phenomenon for everyone involved in public life, and the odd-evenness of the present recovery only points out the existence of these disparities.

In the past couple of years, the government has moved to do away with some of the more obvious obstacles to growth in the regions by signing the Western Accord, the Atlantic Accord and the Nova Scotia Accord. I know that the currently low world oil prices are holding back development, but when prices have increased and activity has resumed, those federal-provincial agreements will give those regions more control and a better share of the returns from the resource development.

The government introduced the Atlantic Enterprise Program to offer two kinds of support, loan insurance and interest buy-downs. It offers 85 per cent coverage of loans for capital investment projects in the Atlantic provinces and reductions of up to 6 percentage points to buy down interest rates on new term loans.

The honourable senator mentioned Cape Breton. Goodness knows we have tried. We brought in Enterprise Cape Breton with an investment tax credit of 60 per cent as a further encouragement to investment in Cape Breton. We set up the Enterprise Cape Breton agency. I am told that up to now they have received over 1,000 applications. The agency has made 511 offers of assistance. If all of those offers of assistance that the agency has made to these various industries which have applied go forward, there is a potential of 3,500 jobs. Eighty-four million dollars is committed to those projects.

[Senator Murray.]

We have not found the permanent answer to the employment problem, the economic problem and the social problem in Cape Breton, to which the Leader of the Opposition referred, but you cannot blame us for trying. The Atlantic Enterprise Program; the Enterprise Cape Breton Program; and the Cape Breton investment tax credit of 60 per cent all reflect the determination of this government to try any reasonable initiative that has some prospect of improving the economic situation in Cape Breton and the Atlantic provinces. Those initiatives make an awful lot more sense to me and, I think, to the taxpayers of the country and of Cape Breton than creating a stockpile of heavy water at a cost of $104 million a year.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: We have negotiated ERDA sub-agreements worth $3 billion to build on regional strengths and potentials in agriculture, tourism, fisheries, mining, manufacturing, science and technology and forestry and still, as the Prime Minister has noted during his visit to the Atlantic provinces some weeks ago, we are not making the headway that we should.

The Speech from the Throne tries yet another approach by way of an Atlantic Opportunities Agency to try to decentralize decision-making. It tries to make the machinery of the federal government more sensitive and more responsive to regional priorities.

When he was Minister of Supply and Services, the Honourable Stewart McInnes introduced a program to increase from $1.6 billion to $2.2 billion over the next few years the federal government's purchases in the Atlantic provinces. That is a job creation measure. I think we also have to ensure that national policies and programs are sensitive to regional considerations, and it surely did not help to liquidate DREE, which was something which happened under our predecessors. They drowned that in something called DRIE. A long time ago, in the heyday of DREE when Jean Marchand and Tom Kent were running it, it was hoped that DREE might play a role of almost being a central agency to examine and review government programs according to regional development criteria. That never happened. I think there is still a need to make regional development goals central to all our activities in government.

I must say that I was rather disappointed to see the Leader of the Opposition straining as he did to find something to criticize in our foreign policy. He suggested, for example, that the relationship with the United States had lost its top place in our priorities. Well, the relationship with the United States is as it has been—Canada's most important bilateral relationship. It does not have as high a profile today as it did a couple of years ago because, when we inherited it, it was in such a state of disrepair as a result of the actions of our predecessors. The relationship has vastly improved; it has become far more mature.

Senator Sinclair: Shakes and shingles.

Senator Murray: Shakes and shingles and all of the other irritants that my friend may refer to surely point out the need for a comprehensive trade agreement between Canada and the United States. That is what we are trying to work for, and I am glad to have the honourable senator's support for that initiative, along with the support of all of the more constructive and moderate Liberals in the land.

We have our differences with the United States. Canada did not embargo Nicaragua when the Reagan administration did. Canada continues to have a development program in Nicaragua. We did not follow the United States and the United Kingdom out of UNESCO because we prefer to work within that agency to try to bring about the necessary reforms. We declined the United States invitation for a government-to-government participation in SDI research. We are able to take these positions in Canada's national interest without damaging our basic relationship with our biggest trading partner, our best friend and our strongest ally.

Trade negotiations are going ahead. As I have said, there is no lessening at all in our commitment to those trade negotiations. We want the best, the biggest and the most comprehensive trade arrangement that can be negotiated.

The Leader of the Opposition warmed over part of his speech in the debate two years ago and talked about our commitment to foreign aid. In that very debate I was able to show the ups and downs and the peregrinations of the Liberal commitment to foreign aid over the years—saying one thing and doing another, establishing targets and retreating from them.

Senator MacEachen: There was no variation for five solid years.

Senator Murray: I do not have the information in front of me—

Senator MacEachen: Look back from 1980 to 1984.

Senator Murray: —but I commend to the Leader of the Opposition the statistics that I obtained two years ago and put on the record here, and I can do it again, if he likes. But I want to tell him and all honourable senators that over the next five years we have committed $13.6 billion to foreign aid. That is not peanuts. I suggest to the honourable senator and to all of my colleagues that our foreign aid programs are well received in the countries where they are working, that we have a good record and that Canada is widely praised for its creative and constructive attitude to aid and development throughout the Third World.

My honourable friend wonders about our commitment to the Caribbean. I had the pleasure, a few months before I joined the cabinet, to represent Canada at the annual governors' meeting of the Caribbean Development Bank. We are one of the biggest contributors to the Caribbean Development Bank and our participation in that bank is highly developed, as is our support for the Contadora process and our support for all of the trade and aid development measures that can be brought forward to lift the economy of Latin America. I mention, by the way, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has very recently completed a political and trade mission to Venezuela, bringing with him, I believe, people from the Canadian private sector to that country, where again he is seeking new commercial opportunities to exercise Canada's influence in that region. The honourable senator was really straining, I thought—possibly out of nostalgia for the job that he held on two different occasions over in the Pearson building—simply straining for something to criticize.

Senator MacEachen: I simply read the speech, that is all; perhaps one should not read it.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator should know that not everything is put into the Speech from the Throne.

Senator MacEachen: Not everything is mentioned in that speech, only the most important things. Africa has replaced the United States.

Senator Murray: Surely the honourable senator is not opposing what we have done and are doing in Africa. Surely he got to Africa once or twice during his own tour of duty as Secretary of State for External Affairs. There is much to be done in Africa.

I must say that the recent appointment of the Honourable David MacDonald as ambassador to Ethiopia is a very good sign, not just to the government of Ethiopia but to all of those in that region who look to Canada to play a leading role.

Senator MacEachen: Yes, we agree with you.

[Translation]

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, two years ago, the Mulroney government made a commitment to achieve national reconciliation. This commitment involves two elements. One is historical; the other is practical and related to the daily management of our federation and the many programs which require co-operation between the two levels of Government.

The historical objectives of national reconciliation to which our government has made a firm and lasting commitment remain to be achieved. These are the assent of Quebec to a constitutional agreement, as mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition earlier, and fulfillment of our constitutional commitment to the native people of Canada.

As Senator Cogger recalled the other day, these challenges do not date back only to 1982 or even to 1867, but to the very first days of our life together on Canadian soil.

In my opinion, the fight against regional disparities is also an essential element of national reconciliation. We have made a national commitment to eliminate these disparities to create equal opportunities throughout the country, to improve the standard of living in the disadvantaged regions and to achieve a more equitable distribution of economic development. We must not let economic disadvantages result in a feeling of resentment or regional alienation.

The spirit of consultation now prevails in our day-to-day federal-provincial relations. It is interesting to note that, during the last 24 months, there have been 32 meetings of first ministers, 467 meetings of ministers and 115 meetings of deputy ministers.

[Senator Murray.]

This commitment to consult comes from the fact that we recognize the provinces as full partners in Confederation and has brought about a renewal of harmonious federal-provincial relations. Thanks to this harmony and to a high level of mutual respect, there has been an impressive number of federal-provincial agreements. I have already mentioned the Atlantic, Western and Nova Scotia Accords.

A record 110 economic and regional development agreements have also been signed with the provinces, representing a total of $4 billion.

I would also like to mention the creation of a yearly first ministers' economic conference, the elimination of major obstacles to the creation of a Francophone summit and the invitation made and accepted by provincial representatives to be present at GATT negotiations.

These agreements are proof positive that new channels of communication are being opened between the federal government and the provinces.

We shall therefore have to find solutions which will benefit everyone instead of exacerbating our differences.

The Leader of the Opposition mentioned Quebec. He must agree that there is an inherent instability for our country in a situation in which Quebec, a major partner in Confederation, the only province in which the majority of its population is French-speaking, does not assent to the Constitution agreed to by the federal Parliament and the other provinces. No one in this country should be complacent about the isolation of Quebec.

Quebec's refusal to participate in constitutional reform under the present circumstances is also a real impediment to future Constitution amendments, whether they relate to property rights, Senate reform or various jurisdictional issues that may need to be resolved or clarified.

The present Government of Quebec has enunciated five conditions which would allow Quebec to subscribe to the constitutional accord. In July the Prime Minister of Canada urged the premiers of the other nine provinces to undertake exploratory discussions, to ascertain whether formal negotiations would have a reasonable prospect of success. I want to say here that, of course, we are proceeding with very considerable prudence, for our part, on the part of Quebec and on the part of the other provinces. We must not get into formal negotiations and fail a third time. We believe—and our conviction is shared by the other partners in Confederation—that such a failure would be a disaster for the country.

Therefore, we have embarked with Quebec and the other provinces on an exploratory process to see whether there would be a reasonable chance of success in a formal negotiation. Such formal negotiation would be based on Quebec's five conditions, and that formal negotiation would be limited to the repatriation of Quebec and not involve other constitutional reforms. Once Quebec was on board, the federal government and the provinces would hold a second round of discussions to undertake other constitutional reforms.

In August the provincial premiers met in Edmonton and responded positively to the Prime Minister's suggestion. They agreed that their first constitutional priority was the repatriation of Quebec. They agreed to continue the exploratory discussions with a view to holding formal negotiations, which would end the isolation of Quebec and clear the way for further constitutional reforms.

The Quebec Minister for Intergovernmental Affairs, with whom I have met twice, is now beginning a round of bilateral discussions with the other provinces. When he has returned from his tour, we will meet again. No doubt there will be consultations between the Government of Canada and the provinces at the official level, as well as at the political level. We are trying to see whether, in the case of each of Quebec's five conditions, it is possible to arrive at a precise constitutional formulation that would have the necessary support of the federal government, of Quebec and of the other provinces.

As demonstrated in the statements of the Prime Minister, of the Premier of Quebec and of the provincial premiers at their Edmonton meeting, there is a national consensus on the need to repatriate Quebec. We are now agreed on a process, on an agenda and on the goal, and I assure the Leader of the Opposition that there is not any qualification of our desire or determination to succeed in that venture.

With regard to aboriginal constitutional affairs, the lead minister in those matters is, as has been the case for some time, the Minister of Justice. Next week I will be going with him and the Minister of Indian Affairs to a meeting with aboriginal groups at the ministerial level, leading to a First Ministers' conference on the subject in the spring of 1987. All parties are agreed that aboriginal self-government will be the major issue at the 1987 First Ministers' conference.

The First Ministers' conference will be the third and last such conference provided for in the 1983 Accord. The second such conference, in April 1985, came within an ace of agreement on a constitutional amendment which would have entrenched the right to self-government and led to the entrenchment of self-government agreements that would be negotiated with the aboriginal groups. Next spring we must succeed where the conference of 1985 almost did. There must be a determination on all sides to succeed at that third and final conference. It must be understood by all concerned that failure in 1987 would be costly. Failure would mean the end of a constitutional process. Who knows whether or how soon a new process could be agreed upon? In the vacuum created by the lack of process, aboriginal constitutional affairs would tend to slide down on the scale of national priorities.

Provinces cannot be sanguine about the risks of failure at the conference next spring. They would find themselves deprived of a constitutional process in which their legitimate interests can be protected and in which they can influence the course of events as it relates to aboriginal affairs. Failure next spring would deprive the aboriginal peoples of a constitutional process in which some progress had been made toward entrenching their rights. Whatever new process might be invented to try to continue, it would be by political agreement. It would not be by constitutional sanction, unless, of course, we were able to agree on another constitutional amendment to require all parties to hold a further series of First Ministers' conferences. It seems to me that it would be much better to devote the time and energy involved in trying to arrive at a more definitive and substantial agreement next spring. Failure would mean that the aboriginal peoples had lost ground in their effort to secure their political rights.

For the country as a whole, failure would have to be reckoned in terms of its potential impact on our social and political fabric and on our national pride and unity. Failure next spring would be costly to all sides. Therefore, we must plan for success. We must do whatever it takes to ensure that the outcome of next spring's conference will have a constitutional status and sanction; and I hope, believe and trust that that is the intention of all of the parties who will be meeting next week in Toronto, again in January and, finally, at the First Ministers' level in the spring of 1987.

Honourable senators, we are now two years into our mandate, and may I say, in summary, that our record is one of appreciable progress toward each of the goals we set out in 1984. We can point to this progress with some satisfaction and, at the same time, ask Parliament and the country to look to the agenda that is ahead of us. Thus, while we are obviously restoring order to the nation's finances, and renewing confidence in their management—and we must continue in that role—we will, in this session, take on the challenges of tax reform, corporate concentration, science and technology and space. Thus, while our economic renewal is under way, and the evidence is there, in investment, job creation and interest rates, we recognize that Canada's economy needs a major impetus to new growth. We have, therefore, launched major new trade initiatives, and in particular the bilateral negotiations with the United States, to provide that impetus to further growth.

We also recognize that the economic recovery is uneven, that, notwithstanding the efforts made and the money expended in the past, serious regional disparity persists. We will be trying new approaches to the problem, and seeking others in cooperation with the provinces and the people in those regions. While we have managed to maintain our social programs and improve the lot of some groups, such as the disabled, widows, veterans and needy families, we are taking the leadership role in addressing major needs in a national context, child care and pension benefits in particular. I am sure that child care will be one of the issues that will be discussed under women's economic issues, which is to be on the agenda of the First Minister's conference to be held in Vancouver in November. Thus, while we have improved enormously the working relationship between the federal government and the provinces, we hope to move forward on the historic challenges to national unity—constitutional reform, aboriginal rights, language reform, regional disparity. While Canada has played a strong role in organizing international action against apartheid in South Africa, there remain the great issues of trade, aid, investment, arms control and security, reform of the United Nations, where Canadian support for multilateral approaches and Canadian leadership in multilateral institutions will be most important. There is, therefore, a great agenda before this Parliament and before the country—tax reform, trade initiatives, regional policy, child care, pension reform, repatriation of Quebec, aboriginal rights, language reform, international issues. I say, honourable senators, that this agenda is worthy of the best efforts of all of us, and one in which I am sure this chamber will play a notable and worthy part.

TERRORISM

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Kelly, pursuant to notice of Thursday, October 2, 1986, moved:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to hear evidence on and consider matters relating to terrorism as a real or potential threat to Canada and to Canadians;

That the Committee examine and make recommendations on the subject-matter and effectiveness of existing statutes, agreements and administrative arrangements pertaining to the combatting of terrorist activity;

That the Committee examine and make recommendations on the role of the media in reporting terrorist threats and incidents;

That eight Senators, to be designated at a later date, act as members of the Special Committee;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee; and

That the Committee report to the Senate no later than June 2, 1987.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Explain.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, once again I must preface my remarks in this chamber by referring to the fact that I am following two of the most eloquent speakers in this chamber. It is a role I keep getting pressed into and one I do not enjoy at all. I shall be very brief, but I must say that it has been an extremely entertaining afternoon. I found, I believe, two items on which Senator MacEachen and Senator Murray agreed. I did not make note of them because they passed so quickly, but I am sure that I could find them if I delved into my memory.

This motion is very similar to the one approved by the Senate on June 3 of this year. There are some changes, however, that I shall explain in a moment. The motion of June 3 expired with the prorogation of Parliament announced by the Prime Minister on August 28. If the committee is to get under way, therefore, the process must be initiated once again beginning with this motion.

I continue to believe that the review contemplated by this motion is both important and timely. The incidence of terrorism worldwide has not decreased since the earlier motion was approved on June 3. Since then, we have had the TWA-Beirut and Pan Am—Karachi hijackings, with a significant loss of life. We have had the “Black September” bombings in France, a French military attaché gunned down in Beirut and a synagogue bombed in Istanbul. There is no more evidence today than there was in June that Canada is immune from such barbarism. The Canadian government recognizes and is taking a leading role to combat international terrorism through organizations such as IATA and ICAO. As the Governor General stated in the recent Speech from the Throne, the Government of Canada “recognizes that security is the surest safeguard of liberty.”

I and several of my colleagues have felt considerable urgency that this examination get under way without further delay. Since June 3, therefore, we have done considerable background and preliminary work within the mandate as set out in the original motion. We did this so that the formal committee hearings could get under way as quickly and effectively as possible this fall when the committee's budget was approved. Given our view of the urgency and importance of the task that faced us, we continued this work, quietly and informally, even after prorogation. In that regard, over the course of this past summer we have seen a total of 62 people. These people have included current and former cabinet ministers, federal public servants, federal, provincial and municipal law enforcement officers, representatives from the working and management levels of the Canadian print and electronic media, recognized experts who have studied some facet of terrorism and continue to have a direct interest in the subject, and a range of other people who, for one reason or another, have a valuable perspective or position to offer.

We have also been in telephone or written contact with a host of government and law enforcement people, academics and other experts in Canada, the United States, the United Kingdom and Australia in order to benefit from their views and experience.

The cooperation and assistance we have received has been gratifying. We have amassed a great deal of information, and we are becoming more and more knowledgeable about the subject. What we have learned only confirms in our minds the need for an investigation of the type contemplated by this motion. I think that we have also reached the point where committee hearings could begin almost immediately. I must also say that the idea of a Senate committee studying terrorism and its impact or possible impact on Canadians has been almost universally and warmly supported by the people to whom we have spoken. That broad base of strong support has encouraged us to press ahead.

I promised at the outset to explain the material changes in this motion compared to the earlier motion, the one passed on June 3. There is really only one change. The earlier motion apparently gave the impression the committee was to undertake a wide-ranging review of the literature on the subject of terrorism. This was not the intention, and we have re-drafted the current motion to clarify that point. I also want to emphasize that this motion does not propose or foresee a comprehensive review of terrorism around the world. The focus is Canada, and how well the federal government is organized institutionally, legislatively and in policy terms to deal with terrorism as it impacts or may impact on Canadians, regardless of the source or rationale of that terrorism. We also wish, with the media, to examine the role of the media in reporting terrorist threats and incidents. We have already had informal meetings with a number of media representatives. Some welcome this review; some do not. We have tried to ensure the media understands that we contemplate no witch-hunt, that we have no pre-conceived notions. Nor do we contemplate the government's unilaterally or arbitrarily devising regulations or guidelines for media conduct in any respect. Those are essentially the objectives of this motion.

During debate on the previous motion, there was some attention given to the potential cost of this exercise. I do not see cost as a major factor that should enter into our consideration of this motion. However, I, together with the clerk, have prepared a draft budget for the committee. It is my understanding that that budget will be presented for approval to the Internal Economy Committee following this debate. We forecast a total expenditure in the range of $175,000.

There are few subjects that I can think of that would be better suited to review by this chamber at this time. We need a forum where the issues can be discussed in a non-partisan fashion. We saw this afternoon an example of how non-partisan we are in this chamber.

Senator MacEachen: At least I was quite non-partisan!

Senator Kelly: However, I think that this committee may be able to function as an exception. We need to apply to the topic the range of disciplines and experience that is readily available in this chamber, from government organization to jurisdictional issues to media experience. We need the calm deliberation of a Senate committee to review this pressing and highly charged issue. To me, there are few better subjects to which the Senate could turn its attention at this time, and I urge approval of this motion.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

LABOUR

BRITISH COLUMBIA LONGSHOREMEN'S LOCKOUT—RESPONSE TO GOVERNMENT REQUEST

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, before I put my question I would like to extend, for the record, my very heartiest congratulations to Senator Murray on his elevation to the cabinet, and at the same time wish him speedy and complete success in the work that he has undertaken in regard to Quebec.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, yesterday the Leader of the Government in the Senate indicated that the Minister of Labour had sent a telegram to the Maritime Employers' Association in Vancouver asking that they concur in the lifting of the lockout in order to permit the loading of grain ships in ports in British Columbia.

In view of the national emergency that has existed in regard to the movement of cereals out of Canada, could he advise the chamber whether there has been a reply?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, first, I wish to thank the Honourable Senator Sinclair for his personal good wishes and, in particular, I express my appreciation to him for his expression of support for the efforts the government is making which we hope will lead to the inclusion of Quebec in the Constitutional Accord.

Senator Frith: They are included; you mean they are signing an agreement.

Senator Murray: Yes, to give their assent to the Constitutional Accord.

The government very much appreciates the support which is generally forthcoming on this matter from all three parties in Parliament.

In answer to the question just put by Senator Sinclair, I am informed by the Honourable the Minister of Labour that the response from the Maritime Employers' Association, which he received within the past hour or so, is, indeed, a positive one.

The British Columbia association has indicated to the minister that it is prepared to resume and continue normal operations forthwith in all ports for a period of 30 days, during which time efforts will be made to resolve the issues in dispute.

I should add that the Maritime Employers' Association has also told the minister that if at the end of 30 days a collective agreement has not been concluded, it would anticipate that Parliament would take the appropriate action.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

SOFTWOOD LUMBER—CANADIAN EXPORT TAX

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question concerning softwood lumber and the current proceedings in the United States.

The Canadian media today is reporting that the Government of Canada has decided to impose an export tax on softwood lumber removals from Canada to the United States. Could the Leader of the Government advise us if there is any further information available in this respect?

[Later]

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I have a question supplementary to the one I addressed to the Leader of the Government a few moments ago. Would the government leader advise whether any province which exports softwood lumber to the United States has requested the Government of Canada not to take action to tax such exports of softwood lumber to the U.S.?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will have to look into that question and bring the information back.

AGRICULTURE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to follow up on the questions I asked yesterday about the $1 billion aid package to western grain farmers.

Yesterday I asked for some additional information for a very specific and, I think, understandable reason, and that is that the farmers of western Canada are facing an extremely difficult financial situation because the international grain markets, for all the reasons already known, are so depressed. They would like to have some way of assessing where they stand with respect to this offer by the federal government.

It has been pointed out that the aid will not take the form of money that has already been committed or that the government is obliged to pay under crop insurance or the Western Grain Stabilization Program and so on.

Quite understandably, the Leader of the Government, at the end of my two or three inquiries, said that I was asking for detail that it would take him some time to obtain. My problem is that if farmers are to try to ascertain, to some extent, what they may receive under this program, they need to know the amount and the rules under which it will be paid.

Since that time there has been a report in at least one newspaper, perhaps in several, that the Minister of Agriculture has indicated that the $1 billion is slated not only for western grain farmers but for farmers all over Canada, which would include the large sector made up of the corn producers in Ontario. I have no objection to their getting some assistance, but that will only mean a dilution of that which was to go to the grain farmers. Obviously, the grain farmers in western Canada have greatly anticipated this form of financial assistance. They were told some time ago that there would be put in place a $1 billion program. I believe that the Premier of Saskatchewan has made a similar announcement two or three times on behalf of the federal government. Now this financial assistance has been significantly diluted by spreading it around even more.

Could the Leader of the Government, at some time, provide us with more specific information on how much is to be distributed in the grain growing area of western Canada and the terms and conditions of that distribution? Obviously, the amount decreases every time the Minister of Agriculture tries to explain what the government is going to do.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will see whether I can bring to the chamber tomorrow some information in answer to some of the questions put by the honourable senator, but I must caution him that I will not, tomorrow or the next day, be in a position to come in here with a complete program design to lay before the Senate. I will, however, attempt to satisfy tomorrow the honourable senator's curiosity on one or two of the major points he has raised.

Senator Olson: I appreciate that. I suppose that the honourable minister wants to wait until the meeting of the ministers of agriculture is over, which meeting, I believe, is going on right now.

Senator Murray: It is to be held tomorrow.

Senator Olson: Would the minister, in addition to seeking information, make some representations on this issue? The farmers of western Canada expect the government to deliver $1 billion of new money. If that is not to be the case, would the minister so indicate so that the farmers will know the basis upon which they are to make plans in anticipation of some financial relief?

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

ALLEGED MISUSE OF MANITOBA INDIAN BAND FUNDS

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the very serious allegations we were made aware of overnight with respect to the financial dealings within the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development as they relate to Indian bands in Manitoba. Those allegations were made by an official of the department who has been responsible for supervising the use of federal funds, which are of the order of some $270 million per year, in Manitoba. He spoke of defaulting on agreements, of the federal department misleading Parliament—I believe he used the word “lying”—and of the department and the minister trying to keep the lid on or move aside an independent audit of last June which indicated that the federal government was withholding promised funds to that province.

Could the Leader of the Government in any way comment upon, or inform senators of the government's response to, these very serious allegations?

● (1410)

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, as a supplementary, I would be grateful if such a reply could be forthcoming as fully and as quickly as possible. I was struck by that part of his speech yesterday in which the government leader underlined the importance of the constitutional negotiations with the aboriginal people and the risks inherent in any failure to reach agreement with them by the deadline next spring. The gentleman in question indicated that similar problems existed in other parts of the country. Would the Leader of the Government not agree that a quick addressing of these concerns would be useful to the government in terms of its own credibility in dealing with constitutional matters affecting the aboriginal people?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there are one or two things that I can tell the honourable senator. First, to the extent that there is any suggestion of wrongdoing in the comments attributed to the employee, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has asked the RCMP to investigate the matter.

Second, I should explain that with regard to the auditors' report, to which she referred, the department responded in some detail to that report, and the auditors agreed that the department's response had been satisfactory.

Since that time, the minister has asked the Indian bands in Manitoba to indicate in what respect they may have found the department's response to be unsatisfactory, inadequate or inaccurate; and the minister has informed me that he has not received any reply to his request.

The minister and the department have furnished me with a good deal of other information about appropriations through the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for programs in Manitoba and across the country. I could, I suppose, put them on the record, but I believe it would be better to ask the minister to examine the questions asked by the honourable senator and to bring in a coherent and organized reply.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

BOARD HEARING PROCEDURES

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government pertains to a decision by Mr. Justice Smith of the Ontario Supreme Court in response to an application for habeas corpus on behalf of an inmate in the Kingston Penitentiary. Mr. Justice Smith denied a writ of habeas corpus in this case but, at the same time, delivered a stinging indictment of the National Parole Board with respect to the hearing that took place concerning this inmate. The application was for detention, as required under the legislation passed this summer. Mr. Justice Smith said:

It must be remembered that this applicant, who has only grade four education, had only received notice that same morning. He acknowledged that he received some material. It is not apparent what was included in the material. He had also received, presumably the same day or at the most a day or so earlier, a copy of the new bills. In answer to a question as to whether he would waive his procedural rights, he asked: "What happens if I not do that?" He was told then that he would be held for four weeks for a regular hearing. He then said: "I'll waive my rights."

He was then asked if he waived his specific right to the information. He said: "Yes." The applicant was then cross-examined by the Board.

Mr. Justice Smith had something to say about that procedure, which seems to be a common practice in these hearings. He said:

—it is inherently unfair that a decision carrying such serious consequences for the inmate should be made so quickly and summarily without any opportunity for the inmate to prepare, to seek advice, to review the evidence and perhaps even to adduce evidence of a psychiatric nature or otherwise that could have had an influence on the ultimate decision. There was no real opportunity to cross-examine the medical witnesses.

He then ordered a new hearing, following which he said:

There ought to be a new regular hearing, however, at once on adequate notice in order to afford a reasonable opportunity to prepare, to seek assistance and to call evidence.

With respect to that hearing, Mr. Justice Smith said:

—I order a hearing in the interest of procedural fairness and the hearing to be in accordance with the rules in that respect which have been articulated many times by the Courts.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Would he consult with his colleague, the Solicitor General of Canada, and instruct the Parole Board to conduct their hearings in accordance with the wishes and directions of Mr. Justice Smith of the Supreme Court of Ontario, permitting the inmate adequate time to prepare for these hearings, to produce psychiatric evidence and an opportunity to cross-examine medical witnesses on evidence that is presented against him?

Senator Austin: It is only natural justice.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am confident that the authorities will respect the decision and comments made by the Justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario. I should add that in that same decision the Court of Appeal found that the law that was passed by this Parliament a while back is constitutional and that there was no violation of the Charter—

Senator Frith: Because of section 1.

Senator Murray:—in applying that law to prisoners who were already detained at the time the law was proclaimed. As the honourable senator has pointed out, the court found that the Parole Board had not complied fully with the rules of procedural fairness in this particular case. As I say, I am confident that the authorities will govern themselves accordingly.

ENERGY

MONITORING OF OIL AND GAS COMPANIES FOLLOWING TERMINATION OF PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government respecting the increased activity in the oil and gas fields that was expected by the government when it announced some time ago the cessation or termination of the PGRT. At the time the government gave an undertaking that it was seeking from the industry generally a commitment that the moneys relieved from that taxation would be used for increasing activity out in the field, thereby creating more jobs. I believe that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources also gave an undertaking that the government would monitor the situation, company by company, because there were only about 40 companies paying the PGRT at the time, to ensure that they delivered on their undertaking.

The reason I am asking the question now is that several weeks have gone by since the agreement was made and there is no indication at all from the companies, through their budgets or statements, that they are, in fact, using this money, however much it is—I believe it is somewhere between $500 million and $700 million annually—for the purpose that they outlined. Therefore, I ask the minister to obtain some information as to the effectiveness of the monitoring of the intentions of these companies to provide real jobs for real people, certainly in the ensuing year for which they are now preparing budgets.

Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and his predecessor have informed me that the capability of the Petroleum Monitoring Agency is extremely sophisticated and that it can, indeed, follow very closely the investment of additional cash-flow such as would be provided as a result of the decision on the PGRT. I will, therefore, be glad to ask them to provide the information that the senator seeks as soon as it is fair and practicable to compile that information.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is obvious that the minister did not understand my question, and I want to take the responsibility for, perhaps, not stating clearly enough or articulating succinctly what I wanted to know. I would tell the minister that I was not asking what the Petroleum Monitoring Agency will be reporting after the fact; in other words, after the money has actually been spent on whatever activity has been undertaken. What I am asking about is whether or not the companies are delivering on the undertaking that the government has claimed it got from these companies when it gave them the relief, and that is that they intended to increase activity out in the field which would give rise to additional jobs. My question is: Have those companies given an indication of what their budget for exploration and development will be for the ensuing season? There are thousands of people out there who are hoping that there will be some seismographic and drilling activity taking place during the winter. That season is almost upon us and we have had no announcements that I know of, in spite of the fact that a number of people have tried to get those companies to make some commitment as to what their increased activity will be.

Senator Murray: Over time, the evidence of this activity is compiled by the Petroleum Monitoring Agency. However, I will see what information can be obtained in the meantime as to the plans that those companies have.

SPORT

DEFINITION OF AGE OF PUBERTY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has been asked some questions this afternoon which may have come as a surprise to him. I would like to ask a question of the leader which does not fall into that category, since it has been around for many centuries, but which his colleague, the Honourable Otto Jelinek, has just made a matter of public policy and record.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us how the government is planning to define the age of puberty with respect to its new and laudable policy of having girls and boys involved in sports together? Further, I would like to ask how the government intends to have the sponsoring agencies administer tests, and how that policy will be played out?

I would like to say that I think the intentions of this policy are ones which we would want to support. Perhaps the Leader of the Government can tell us at the same time why the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport has chosen the age of puberty as the point at which to terminate this policy.

Senator Marsden: Am I then to take it that the Leader of the Government is telling us that he does not know the answer?

Senator Murray: Yes.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

REQUEST FOR TEXT OF TELEX DATED OCTOBER 2, 1986 FROM
PREMIER OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I want to thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate for tabling the telex of October 3, 1986 from the Premier of Prince Edward Island to the Prime Minister of Canada. However, I believe it was a telex dated October 2, 1986 that was referred to by the Prime Minister in the other place. I wonder whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate would be able to table the telex of October 2 which the Prime Minister quoted from in the other place?

Second, perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate would convey to the Prime Minister that, before he uses a communication in the public forum from a premier of any of the provinces, it would be courteous to ask permission to do so of the premier involved. That is a courtesy that has been shown by all other Prime Ministers of Canada.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I was not aware that there was a second telex. The telex to which I referred yesterday had been sent to the Prime Minister, with a copy to me. I did not receive the first telex to which the honourable senator has referred. However, I will look into the matter and see whether or not we have such a telex and, if we have, whether the Premier of Prince Edward Island would agree to having it tabled here.

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED TUNNEL OR CAUSEWAY BETWEEN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND MAINLAND

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: My second question has nothing to do with telexes but with the Government of Prince Edward Island and the Government of Canada.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise me if, at this time, the Government of Canada is considering undertaking a study, conducting a survey or doing something financially or otherwise to establish a permanent crossing facility to Borden, Prince Edward Island, from Cape Tormentine, New Brunswick, and, if so, have there been any offers from private enterprise to construct such a facility?

[Senator Marsden.]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have seen the same media reports that I presume my honourable friend has seen on this matter, but the subject has not come to my attention officially since I joined the cabinet. I will have to ask for a report.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

CLOSING OF NORWOOD GROVE, ST. BONIFACE, POST OFFICE

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and is in reference to a question asked yesterday in the other place by the member for Winnipeg North Centre. The question related to the possible closing of the Norwood Grove Post Office in St. Boniface.

In answering the question put by the member for Winnipeg North Centre, the minister, in part, stated:

We have been informed that the customers involved have indeed been consulted and that a decision will be announced in due time.

I wish to emphasize that the minister stated:

We have been informed that the customers involved have indeed been consulted—

That almost leads me to believe that the minister was misinformed, because I received a letter on Monday, October 6, dated Friday, October 3. I am told I am one of 60 who received this letter, or a similar letter, and it requests that I attend a meeting so that I can be consulted. Because of the importance of this matter, I should like to read the letter. It states:

Mr. Joe Guay
141 Monck Avenue
WINNIPEG, Manitoba
R2H 1X1

Dear Mr. Guay:

Canada Post Corporation has scheduled meetings with individuals served through Norwood Grove Post Office, who have identified an interest in the previously announced postal operational changes in this area of Winnipeg.

These meetings will be open to designated customers only. During each meeting, the rationale for such operational changes will be fully reviewed. Our customers will also have the opportunity to offer alternatives and express their views and opinions.

You are invited to attend the meeting with corporate representatives scheduled for 7:00 p.m., Thursday, October 9, 1986, at the Canada Post Corporation Boardroom, 7th Floor Richardson Building, One Lombard Place, Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Please show this letter to Security personnel, Main Floor, Richardson Building, prior to accessing the building elevators.

We look forward to your attendance and thank you for your interest in Canada Post Corporation.

I was surprised to receive this letter because the citizens of the area have already held meetings without the members of the Canada Post Corporation being present. A petition containing approximately 3,000 signatures has already been sent to the Canada Post Corporation. This post office serves a large area of the community. There are only two post offices serving the St. Boniface area, one being the Norwood Grove Post Office and the other being the St. Boniface Post Office. They are some distance apart.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to discuss this matter with the minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation so that he can be brought up to date and be told what has taken place.

I will send the leader a copy of this letter, but I should like to know if the leader has any comments in this regard.

I think I should remind honourable senators, for the record, that a previous Parliament made Canada Post a crown corporation. These decisions are not taken at the political level, but there is, as the honourable senator has pointed out, a minister who reports to Parliament for that crown corporation. I undertake to convey the senator's representations to that minister to see what report I can bring back.

Senator Guay: I should also like to ask why the Canada Post Corporation is using security personnel to restrain Canadian citizens from attending an open public meeting? The Canada Post Corporation is not going to allow members of the press or anyone else into that meeting, except those who have received this or a similar letter which must be produced in order to gain entrance to the meeting.

If it is the policy of the Canada Post Corporation to use security personnel to restrain people from attending public meetings, that is the last straw.

Senator Murray: I will ask for an explanation of that as well.

INDUSTRY

AEROSPACE—ALLOCATION OF CF-18 SERVICE CONTRACTS

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: I should like to ask the leader another very important question. Perhaps the leader would like to be ahead of the members of the other place in making an announcement regarding the CF-18 service contracts and Bristol Aircraft. Would the honourable leader be prepared to make an announcement to the Senate today?

● (1430)

Senator Guay: Thank you.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Cogger, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, for an Address to Her Excellency the Governor General in reply to Her Speech at the opening of the Session.—(Honourable Senator Frith) (2nd day of resuming debate.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I propose to adjourn the debate on this order. However, before doing so, I wish to remind honourable senators that with respect to this order we have decided that we will have eight days of debate. We have already had two days of debate and that leaves us, obviously, six days. There are no questions about that—

An Hon. Senator: Great mathematician!

Senator Petten: Agreed!

Senator Frith: I worked it out on my calculator before I rose to my feet! It seems to me, honourable senators, that it would be wise for us to try to use those six days in such a way that all honourable senators who wish to speak to the order will have an opportunity to do so. I suppose we could always extend the time, if necessary. However, I am encouraging senators on this side and also on the other side to let their whips or their deputy leader know that they are interested in speaking so that we can strive for at least two speakers per side for the six days that remain. That probably means that we might not debate this order tomorrow, either. With that explanation, honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate on this order.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: The order stands, because otherwise it would be considered as having been debated.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): It is considered stood.

Order stands.

TERRORISM

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE APPOINTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to hear evidence on and consider matters relating to terrorism as a real or potential threat to Canada and to Canadians;

That the Committee examine and make recommendations on the subject-matter and effectiveness of existing statutes, agreements and administrative arrangements pertaining to the combatting of terrorist activity;

That the Committee examine and make recommendations on the role of the media in reporting terrorist threats and incidents;

That eight Senators, to be designated at a later date, act as members of the Special Committee;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee; and

That the committee report to the Senate no later than June 2, 1987.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, since Senator Kelly spoke on this motion yesterday, I have had an opportunity to consult with my colleagues. We propose to support this motion for the establishment of this committee. I was persuaded by the reasons put forward by Senator Kelly and by my colleagues on this side that it would be a good idea to proceed with it.

I want to emphasize that the limitations he put on the scope of the inquiry had something to do with the support that we are prepared to give for the motion. Therefore, we are hopeful that he will remember—as I am sure he will, and as I am sure the members of the committee will—that previously there were concerns about an inquiry of this kind going further than the Senate would like it to go. As I understand it, what he proposes essentially is to consider the administrative and other arrangements in existence in Canada with respect to this threat of terrorism and, more particularly, as this threat would pertain to Canada. That is the way he explains the scope of the study.

I want to say also, honourable senators, that—and I want it understood that I do not blame Senator Kelly for this in any way—this as an example of what I think has turned out to be a failure in our rules to solve a problem that I think was shared by many senators on the question of the setting up of a special committee.

Some time ago we were concerned—if I remember the problem accurately—with the fact that when a senator proposes the establishment of a special committee or when a standing committee proposes a special study that involves or might involve the spending of money, the Senate, before authorizing the study to go forward, or the special committee to be formed, would like to have some idea of the amount of money involved before voting on it. It was in response to that problem that we adopted, after a recommendation from the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, rule 83A. which, of course, is a very short rule; it simply refers one to the appendix. Without going through all of the provisions of Appendix III, what it amounts to is that, for example, in this case Senator Kelly has not asked for the authority to do anything that would require the expenditure of special funds, such as travel or the hiring of special assistance. If he follows—as I know he proposes to do—Appendix III, he will expect us to adopt the motion, which does not ask for the spending of money. Then he will proceed to draw up a budget with his committee and present the budget to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. The Internal Economy Committee will then have to discuss the spending of money by a committee that has not been authorized to spend money, and will then, I suppose, make a report, according to the rules, and tell Senator Kelly its views on the proposed budget. Then all that Senator Kelly has to do, according to Appendix III, as I read it, is report, if he wishes, to the Senate. In other words, the very thing we wanted to achieve, namely, that the Senate would not approve the expenditure of funds until it knew what the amount was, is not achieved by Appendix III. I have discussed this with the clerk of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders and want to say that Senator Kelly will proceed, I assume, under Appendix III, but I think that we have to have a look at that and ask the Rules Committee to try harder to come up with something that will achieve the rather simple objective that gave rise to rule 83A and Appendix III.

So, honourable senators, I propose to support the motion of Senator Kelly in that context.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this might be an appropriate time to discuss the future business of the Senate.

We have before us now the names of the members of five standing committees of the Senate. With that in mind, it seems to me that the subject matter of various bills can be referred to those committees during the coming week or weeks. Certainly, the two most important bills in terms of progress in the other place are Bills C-5 and C-6, which were before the Senate during the last session, as, I believe, Bill C-92 and Bill C-94. One of them dealt with the Newfoundland Accord, the other with changes to the National Energy Program. They had been referred for pre-study to the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, and my memory tells me that several meetings were held and that several witnesses were heard from, and then Parliament adjourned and eventually prorogued.

Now that that committee has been reconstituted, it seems appropriate to refer the subject matter of those two bills, Bill C-5 and Bill C-6, to that committee for pre-study.

These two bills have been placed on the order paper of the other place at the same stage they had been at when Parliament adjourned; that is to say, one of the bills is at the report stage and the other is at the legislative committee stage. So, we can anticipate that these two bills will come to the Senate fairly soon.

With that in mind, and assuming that that particular committee will meet during the proposed adjournment of the Senate, I propose that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, October 28.

With the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources considering the subject matter of those two bills, and the other committees that were formed this morning meeting to establish their order of business, and with the probability that the Senate Committee on National Finance will meet to discuss the draft report on Post-Secondary Education, there is ample work to keep senators busy. I might mention that the Senate Committee on National Finance met informally this morning, without being duly constituted, because the members of that committee who did some preliminary work on the draft report wanted to discuss that draft report. I know that during the coming weeks that committee intends to hold further meetings.

With respect to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, it is expected that the subject matter of three bills which were introduced in the other place will be referred to that committee. Those bills are: Bill C-8, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, the Foreign Insurance Companies Act and the Winding-up Act; Bill C-9, to amend the Loan Companies Act, the Trust Companies Act, the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act with respect to certain regulatory matters; and a third bill which has a degree of urgency attached to it and which arises from the tabling of the Notice of Ways and Means Motion in the other place to amend the Income Tax Act—that is, the Child Tax Credit Bill—and I am told that, in order for the provisions of that particular piece of legislation to take effect for the current taxation year, the deadline is November 5. At least, that is the hope of the government. It is my hope that that committee will deal with the subject matter of these three bills during the adjournment period.

Therefore, since there is no legislation before us at the present time, and since we anticipate the legislation that I mentioned arriving during the next little while, it might be most practical to have the appropriate Senate committees meet to deal with the pre-study of the subject matter of these bills rather than have the whole Senate sit to deal with the committee work. If this suggestion commends itself to the Senate, then we would be most happy to follow that course. I might say, of course, that we are always mindful of the Senate rule under which we can be called back if something demands our immediate attention.

Senator MacEachen: If there is an important cocktail party!

Senator Doody: I don't think I'll comment on that at all. I don't see any graceful way of handling it. So, having said that, I commend that course of action to honourable senators. If the committees can give us some reasonable assurance that they will deal with the subject matter of these bills, then I will propose, later today, that the Senate adjourn until October 28.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the program set out by the Deputy Leader of the Government seems to us to be quite reasonable, in light of the fact that there is no pending legislation coming this way, and there seems to be no indication that we will get legislation shortly. When an insider like my colleague, the Deputy Leader of the Government, assures us that that is his impression also, then we have to consider how best we can do our duty as it relates to the bills he has mentioned. It seems to me that his proposed solution is the right one. When there is no legislation to deal with immediately, our most practical course is to refer the subject matter of every pending piece of legislation to our committees. This would not only avoid the necessity of our sitting in the chamber but would also give the committees a lot more time to do their work. We will certainly cooperate with the suggested program, and I hope that we will be able to have sessions of the committees lasting, if necessary, several hours per day. In fact, some committees might want to sit a whole day to hear witnesses that might be called with respect to its study. So, we support the proposals put forward by the Deputy Leader of the Government, and I think that is a sensible way to deal with our work in the context of the opening of a new session.

Incidentally, honourable senators, I understand that Senator Doody will also be proposing that the committees have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

Senator Doody: That is entirely accurate, honourable senators; I have such a motion before me. I have a note here on my desk as well from an interested senator who asks: What about Internal Economy? The Internal Economy Committee has been constituted today. If members of that committee wish to hold an organizational meeting or a working meeting, they are perfectly entitled to do so and I suspect that such a meeting will be held.

● (1410)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the present plan is that the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration will hold a meeting next Tuesday to deal with some outstanding matters and, of course, to organize. It is the committee's intention to embark upon the consideration of the budget figures for 1987-1988.

The committee also plans to meet the following week.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Has the honourable senator opposite had an opportunity to look at the committee schedule?

Senator Frith: No, I have not. I discussed this matter only a few hours ago with someone from the Speaker's office who is to get in touch with the whips about this matter.

Honourable senators, I should like to correct what I have just said. The plan is to meet on the Tuesday of the following week. It is our hope that, following that meeting, our committee will meet on Thursday mornings, as we did last year, but that proposal will have to be agreed to by the whips.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PARLIAMENTARY EMPLOYMENT AND STAFF RELATIONS

DELAY IN PROCLAMATION OF ACT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Towards the end of last June we were asked to give what was really rather hurried approval to Bill C-45, which had to do with parliamentary employment and staff relations. Both Senator Corbin and I raised some questions about the effect of that bill upon senators' privileges. We were then told that there was a great deal of urgency in passing this bill due to the serious effect it would have upon the bargaining rights of employees and, generally, upon their conditions of work.

I find, however, that the act has not yet been proclaimed. If I am mistaken in that respect, I would be glad to know that that is the case. Could the Leader of the Government find out whether I am correct in my understanding? Could he also tell us why, if there was such urgency to pass that bill, the act has not been proclaimed for these many months since June of 1986?

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—STATUS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On Tuesday the Leader of the Government clarified to some extent the intentions of the government with respect to the trade negotiations with the United States. I would like to know what is the timetable of the government—if there is a timetable—with respect to the closing of the negotiations and when the process will be completed with respect to the signing of an agreement with the United States.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I believe that the Leader of the Opposition will be aware that according to the so-called fast track procedure agreed upon by the Congress of the United States, January 3, 1988 is the date on which the procedure expires. I would have to go back in the process somewhat to be able to calculate when our officials should have completed and initialed an agreement, ad referendum, by what time the Canadian government would have had to approve such an agreement, and by what time the administration in the United States would have had to submit such an agreement to Congress to have the whole thing over and done with by January 3, 1988. I am not in a position to speculate on that today beyond saying that, obviously, it would be prudent to plan on having an understanding between Canada and the United States some months before January 3, 1988.

Senator MacEachen: I am aware of the provisions of the American law. I wondered whether the Canadian government had given instructions to the negotiator to have his work completed by a particular date so that the necessary steps could be undertaken for debate within the Canadian Parliament, and so that everyone would know what the results of the negotiations were.

I understand there is a limit in the United States, but do we have a deadline? Has Mr. Rasminsky been given a deadline as to when he must complete—

An Hon. Senator: Mr. Reisman.

Senator MacEachen: Mr. Reisman, yes. I thank the honourable senator. They are both very important Canadians. Has Mr. Reisman been given a deadline as to when he must complete his negotiations? Has he been given any direction, or is he free to complete as he chooses?

Senator Murray: We have not set a deadline for the conclusion of Ambassador Reisman's work. As the Leader of the Opposition will know, elections are taking place in the United States at present. The first phase of the discussions between our respective negotiating teams has been concluded, and it is intended that they will resume the process in November.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I want to follow up on the same subject by referring to an editorial which appeared today in The Washington Post entitled "Free Trade with Canada?", in which it is suggested that the trade talks are going so badly, particularly because of the lack of enthusiasm on the part of the Canadian Prime Minister, that the talks should be broken into two stages; the first to be a discussion of current trade irritants, and the second to be an indeterminate discussion about free trade that may result, in the long-term future, in an agreement.

I wish to ask two questions based on that assertion. The first is whether the Canadian embassy has been floating this thought in Washington, and, second, whether the Canadian government is considering this two-staged approach to the trade talks.

Senator Murray: The short answer to the question is that we are not. Our position, and that of our negotiator, is that so far as current trade irritants are concerned there is a bilateral process for dealing with them, and they are dealt with in that process. Our position is that in the trade negotiations being conducted by Ambassador Reisman and Ambassador Murphy there is no place for the discussion of a resolution of current trade irritants.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government tell us whether the government is satisfied that Canada's determination to pursue these talks is understood in the United States? I find it rather disturbing that this important newspaper should write an editorial in which it states:

Prime Minister Brian Mulroney gives every evidence of having embarked on these talks without having given any great thought to them. He seems now to have retreated from this crucial political quarrel.

I want to know if the government is taking any action to counteract the impression in the United States that the Government of Canada appears to have lost heart and appears to have lost its enthusiasm, particularly in light of the Prime Minister's comment that if he were a betting man he would bet against the success of these talks. I want to know whether the government is giving any thought to counteracting these impressions, both in Canada and in the United States.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, if my honourable friend were a betting man and were betting on the possibility of concluding a comprehensive free trade agreement with the United States in the month of October, 1986 with an impending Congressional election in that country, I presume that he, too, would bet against it. The agreement that we seek will not be negotiated in the month of October or the month of November, 1986, but beyond the election date. Therefore, we remain very positively committed to obtaining the biggest, best and most comprehensive trade arrangement that we can negotiate with the United States. Those are the Prime Minister's and the government's instructions to the negotiators.

I have not read the editorial in The Washington Post to which the Leader of the Opposition has referred. I can only say, from the excerpts that he has read, that the editorial is very much off-base and that I doubt very much that the inspiration for such an editorial would have come from the Canadian Embassy in Washington. I suspect that the inspiration for such an editorial would have come from elsewhere.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I wonder whether The Washington Post is really off-base in light of the comment reported to have been made by the Minister for International Trade, who stated that if Canada did not get satisfaction on the softwood lumber case the trade talks with the United States would be imperilled. The word is "imperilled", and it was used by a minister of the Government of Canada. I want to know whether the Minister for International Trade was serious, and whether it is the intention of the government to withdraw from the talks if an adverse decision with regard to the softwood lumber case comes from the United States. That is the implication of her statement, and it could provide a very strong basis for the editorial conclusion of The Washington Post.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, if there is an adverse decision in the case of softwood lumber, there are many options open to us, and we are considering several of them. One of them is not withdrawing from the trade negotiations with the United States. I have not seen the statement which the Leader of the Opposition attributes to Ms. Carney, or the context in which it was made. Since it concerns comments attributed to her, I shall ask her to prepare a reply for the honourable senator.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, just to complete that round and to assure my colleagues that it is not a fictitious allusion, the quotation is from The Associated Press in which she is reported to have said:

A negative countervail decision would create such an adverse reaction in Canada, I think the free-trade talks would be imperilled.

That is what The Associated Press reports that she said. That is a rather serious statement by a minister, and I think it requires some clarification if we are not to believe that The Washington Post is dead on.

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—IMPACT ON INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE BARRIERS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Can he tell us whether the abolition of trade barriers between the provinces of Canada is a condition sine qua non before the approval or ratification of a comprehensive Canada-U.S. free trade treaty?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The answer to that question is in the negative, honourable senators. I hope that we will make some progress within the next little while on the abolition of barriers to interprovincial trade. I note that at Edmonton in August the premiers gave certain undertakings and made certain commitments in that regard. It may well be that the lowering or elimination of barriers to interprovincial trade would be a happy result of a comprehensive bilateral trade arrangement with the United States.

AGRICULTURE

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in connection with the proposed or suggested deficiency payments on grain. As I understand it, the initial request made by Ted Turner of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool was for a payment of $2 billion to the Western Grain Producers. The response seemed to be that there would be a payment of $1 billion. That appears now to have been modified so that whatever is paid out will be paid out as a national payment, and, therefore, the prairie grain producers obviously would not be entitled to $1 billion but would receive very substantially less.

Also, just to throw in another very negative factor, the Minister of Agriculture was asked whether or not the payments to the farmers would be a loan; this was not denied by the Minister of Agriculture.

I ask the government leader if he can assure the chamber that the payment to farmers who are in difficult circumstances will not be in the form of a loan but will, in fact, be a deficiency payment.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the position of the government is that this is a national problem; that it requires a national solution and a national program. That is why the Minister of Agriculture has convened a meeting in Ottawa today of the deputy ministers of the various provinces. I think it is quite premature to speculate as to the design of the program that will be agreed upon. I can only say that yes, the Prime Minister in his statement indicated that our estimate was that it was a $1 billion problem. We will see how that estimate conforms to the assessment and evaluation that is made by the provinces.

As I say, it would be premature to speculate on the nature of the program that will be brought forward, except to say that we are looking at a very considerable enhancement of the cash-flow to Canadian farmers who are faced with this unfair competition in the form of subsidy and pricing practices in other countries.

Senator Argue: Do I take it, then, from the reply of the Leader of the Government that the farmers of Canada are expected to meet the enhanced competition from the United States by way of signing notes and agreeing to pay for a loan that they will receive? I think this is a complete denial by the government of the conditions out there. If I may say so, I think it is a betrayal of the farmers in these circumstances to have allowed them to think that there was to be a deficiency payment and then, when the time comes to inaugurate a policy, the deficiency payment is all of a sudden being turned into a loan. I would say to the Honourable Leader of the Government that those farmers out there simply do not need any more loans. They have more than they can handle now.

Also, before I sit down, I would just point out to the Leader of the Government that the state of the crop in western Canada that is not yet harvested may well mean that crops that might have been worth $3 to $4 per bushel will probably now be worth only $2 or less per bushel. I ask the Leader of the Government if he can assure the farmers that these moneys that they are to receive will not be repayable; that they will, in fact, be deficiency payments to meet a difficult situation.

Senator Murray: The circumstances that the honourable senator has just described, having to do with a crop that is only half in, as I understand it, in Alberta and even less than that in Saskatchewan, are in themselves good reason why it is premature to try to dot "i"'s and cross "t"'s and put a final definition on the program of assistance that we are working on.

With respect to the question of loan versus deficiency payment versus acreage payment versus numerous other formulae that are being suggested from all sides, I must say that certainly nothing that I have said today would warrant the conclusion drawn by the honourable senator that the government has decided that it will propose a loan program to the farmers.

Senator Argue: The words that the minister has used indicates that that is now one of the options that is being considered, and I do not think it should be considered.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that is precisely what the deputy ministers from the various provinces are meeting here to discuss with the federal minister and his officials now. I cannot say what all of the options are that are being considered, or what combination of programs might be brought to bear on this problem.

ENERGY

MONITORING OF OIL AND GAS COMPANIES FOLLOWING TERMINATION OF PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a further question with respect to the matter of increased activity in the energy sector in addition to my question of yesterday. The reason I am asking a further question today is not because I expect him to have specific details related to those matters that I raised yesterday, but arises from the fact that the deputy leader has moved that the Senate stand adjourned until October 28. There will, therefore, not be another Question Period in the Senate before that time.

Honourable senators, this is not a hypothetical matter. In terminating the PGRT, the government has, in fact, given tax relief in the amount of several hundred million dollars to at least 40 oil companies. I ask the Leader of the Government when he can give an undertaking that the government is going to ensure that the commitment they required from those oil companies will be honoured; in other words, that this money will be used to increase and enhance activity out in the field and to create jobs in the oil sector for several thousand people who are waiting for that kind of activity to be announced.

Honourable senators, there is some urgency to this matter because much of the activity that was expected, according to the Minister of Energy, was winter-related programs and programs out in the field that are undertaken when the ground is frozen. Apparently, these programs cannot be undertaken at any other time of year. That time is nearly upon us and it is, therefore, time for the oil companies to be putting together, first of all, their announcements and, second, the budgetary considerations involved, as well as the crews who will actually be involved in doing that type of work out in the field. That is why it is urgent that we get some answers now. It is not hypothetical as to what the program might be and so on. That undertaking has already been given.

Having said that, however, I undertake, on our first day back here, to bring to the Senate and to the honourable senator all of the available information that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources can let me have on that subject.

Senator Olson: That is a fairly good answer, but not quite good enough. The honourable leader says that he will undertake to bring to the Senate the available information. I would like the undertaking to be a little firmer than that and have the Leader of the Government undertake that he will make sure that the government is, in turn, ensuring that the oil companies are keeping their word.

Senator Murray: I think my friend can take that for granted.

Senator Olson: Thank you.

BANKING

ESTEY COMMISSION OF INQUIRY—STATUS OF REPORT

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, earlier today the Leader of the Government in the Senate made reference to Bill C-9, which deals, in part, with the regulation of banks, and the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Arising from that, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could inform us when the Estey Report will be made available.

I ask that question because I noted in August that counsel to the Estey Commission, Mr. Sopinka, said that the commission's work had been done and that the commission's report had been made to the government. I also noted that the honourable Mr. Justice Estey had resumed his usual place on the bench of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am under the distinct impression that the government has not yet received the report of the Estey Commission. Certainly, the last time I inquired, which was a week or ten days ago, the report had not been received, but I will double-check that information to ensure that I am up to date and reliable.

Senator Sinclair: Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate suggesting that there is a difference between Mr. Justice Estey's responding to his mandate in returning the report to the person who established the commission and the report's being placed in the hands of the government? Is that what the leader is suggesting?

Senator Murray: One matter that sometimes delays reports is their translation into the official language other than the language in which they were written.

I was not in the cabinet at the time, but my recollection is that the commission appointing Mr. Justice Estey to undertake that inquiry was made on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, so I would assume that the report would be presented to the Prime Minister.

My latest information is that we do not have the report.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, my information is that the report, which consists of some 700 pages, has been available for many weeks. The translation of 700 pages, in the highly efficient translation bureaus available in this great city, is not such a great task.

Senator Murray: I am glad to have that further information from the honourable senator. If I am incorrect in the understanding which I have just conveyed to the Senate, I will apologize to the Senate and correct the record.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, in light of the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce considering the subject matter of legislation dealing with banks, and in view of the importance of the findings of the Estey Commission, is there not some way—if the report is, as I understand it, available, and if there is a problem with the translation—the Leader of the Government in the Senate could impress upon his colleagues the need to let the committee members have a look at the report so that they are not chasing around in a vacuum when there is an important report on the horizon.

Senator Murray: I share my honourable friend's curiosity in that regard; I should like very much to see the report, too. I shall make inquiries immediately.

HUMAN RIGHTS

JAPANESE CANADIANS—GOVERNMENT APOLOGY AND COMPENSATION

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate on compensation and an apology to Canadian citizens of Japanese descent for the actions taken by the Government of Canada during World War II and shortly thereafter.

In light of the previous answers tendered by the former Leader of the Government in the Senate to the contrary, would the new Leader of the Government in the Senate inform the Senate if the press reports and the press comments emanating from the Minister of State for Multiculturalism are correct and that the government is now considering a formula for individual compensation for those Canadian citizens who were unjustly deprived of their property during that period of time?

Senator Grafstein: I have one other question on that same issue. While the leader is inquiring, would he seek to answer a question I asked previously—that is, whether or not the government has available to it claims made by Canadian citizens for compensation that were never dealt with?

Apparently, a series of compensation claims were made that were filed with the government but never dealt with. Perhaps the leader might inquire into that as well.

Senator Murray: I shall do that as well.

NATIONAL STATISTICS COUNCIL

MEMBERSHIP—REGIONAL REPRESENTATION

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Some honourable senators will recall that on a number of occasions I felt it appropriate to remind the former administration that on the appointment of persons to crown corporations, agencies, and so forth, it was important that the regions of Canada be properly represented.

[Senator Murray.]

Today I received, as I am sure all honourable senators have, a press release from the Honourable Monique Vézina, the Minister responsible for Statistics Canada. In that press release the minister announces:

—the formation of a National Statistics Council to provide advice to the Chief Statistician of Canada with respect to the full range of Statistics Canada activities, particularly in relation to program priorities.

In the wind-up of the press release, the minister welcomes the members to the council, and says:

“the high professional calibre of this council will help Statistics Canada play its important role in Canadian society in the years to come”.

By my quick count, there were 38 persons appointed to the council, plus one ex officio member who is the Chief Statistician of Canada. I accept at once that they are all competent people.

However, I see that for the province of Ontario there were at least 15 members appointed, for Quebec, at least nine, for the western region—four provinces—eight, four of whom are from British Columbia and from Atlantic Canada only two. Even the United States has one member designated to it.

I also note that it is somewhat insensitive in that out of 39 members there were only nine Canadian women appointed. The member from the United States is also a woman.

I also note that there is no representative from two of the Atlantic provinces, none from the Yukon, none from Saskatchewan, none from the Northwest Territories, and I find it quite unacceptable, because of the importance stressed by the minister of the work this group is to do in an advisory capacity, that other segments of society have been forgotten. No one from the aboriginal peoples of Canada has been appointed, and this subject is vitally important to them.

My question is really a plea to the minister. Would he please take this up with his colleague, and if there is a council of some 39 people, surely another half dozen, or four or five, would not overweight such a council while giving proper representation to those people deserving of it? Would he please do that?

FISHERIES

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY FISH MARKETING IN CANADA—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Hon. Jack Marshall, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, October 7, 1986, moved:

That The Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries be authorized to examine all aspects of the marketing of fish in Canada, and all implications thereof;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject before the Committee during the 1st Session of the 33rd Parliament be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee report no later than September 15, 1987.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): No; I would like to stand this motion until—

Senator Doody: Before the honourable senator stands it, I have a few explanatory notes here which might be helpful. After that, if Senator MacEachen wishes to stand it, certainly he has every right to do so.

Honourable senators, on February 6, 1985 the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry was given an order of reference pertaining to a study of the marketing of fish in Canada and all implications thereof. On May 14, 1986 the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry was divided into two separate committees, one being the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and the other the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries. As a result, the order of reference of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry pertaining to a study of the marketing of fish in Canada and all implications thereof was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries on June 12, 1986.

The first of the three components of this study, which dealt with a freshwater fishery sector, has been completed and an interim report was released on September 29, 1986. Before the prorogation of Parliament, preparations were under way for the committee to undertake the second phase of its study, the marketing of west coast fish and fishery products. A consultation tour to the west coast was scheduled for October and cancelled due to the prorogation. Senator Marshall hopes that the committee will re-schedule these consultations for the second and third weeks of November. This portion of the study will specifically look into all the important aspects of marketing west coast fish and fishery products both domestically and internationally.

During the first session, the committee had submitted a budget of $176,712 for this phase of the study; it is now estimated to be $130,140, since it seems that the committee will be able to travel with DND. The trip to the west coast itself will cost $45,100; the committee will also retain the services of a director of research and of an administrative and research assistant. In this phase, there will also be a provision for the committee to attend the Seafood Trade Show in Boston, which should cost about $13,000.

Senator Marshall has provided me with this information. Obviously, it is a continuation of a program which had been approved in the previous session of the Senate. Therefore, I am pleased to move the motion on his behalf.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I want to assure the Deputy Leader of the Government that I am seeking to adjourn the debate on this motion simply so that I can have some consultations with my colleagues who are particularly interested in the question of fisheries, so that when the motion is passed it will have been passed after full consideration.

On motion of Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

CANADA PETROLEUM RESOURCES

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-5

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Tuesday, October 7, 1986, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-5, An Act to regulate interests in petroleum in relation to frontier lands, to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and to repeal the Canada Oil and Gas Act, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I will not object to this, but I wonder if the Honourable Senator Doody could give the house some assurance that the minister will appear before this committee if it meets next week, or some date soon, because I would like to ask him the same questions I asked Senator Murray a few minutes ago. Perhaps we can get some information that is useful to those people who are unemployed in the oil and gas business.

Senator Doody: I can assure the honourable senator that every effort will be made to have the minister in attendance. Certainly, there is no objection from this side; we have found the ministry to be most cooperative in previous meetings of that particular committee and, indeed, in all the committees. I think that it is reasonable to assume that the minister will present himself to the committee to answer any questions relating to this matter or to other energy matters.

Senator Olson: I appreciate that, but I don't want to do only those things that it is reasonable to assume; I would like to have the deputy leader give us an undertaking that he will do his best to ensure that the minister appears there so that we can get into these questions that we all have such a great interest in. I don't think that we can assume that he will be there, because, if we hold a meeting and he doesn't come, what can we do about it?

Senator Doody: Well, if the honourable gentleman will feel better by having me say that I will do my very best to get him there, I will certainly be only too happy to do that. I thought you would have been happier with the assurance that the minister will do everything reasonable to assure that he will be there, but certainly I will do my very best to ensure that he comes—even if I have to drag him there in chains and whips to please the honourable gentleman. You know how cooperative I am!

Senator Olson: And if you are supported by Senator Murray in that undertaking, it will be worth even more.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-NEWFOUNDLAND ATLANTIC ACCORD IMPLEMENTATION

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Tuesday, October 7, 1986, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-6, An Act to implement an agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador on offshore petroleum resource management and revenue sharing and to make related and consequential amendments, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

He said: I might, for the sake of my honourable friend and others, give the assurance that I will do my very best to ensure that the minister arrives to discuss that very important bill as well.

Senator Olson: Very good.

Motion agreed to.

THE HONOURABLE EARL A. HASTINGS

FELICITATIONS ON JOHN HOWARD SOCIETY OF ONTARIO AWARD

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to take a few moments of the Senate's time to draw to the attention of those who do not already know and the thousands of people who read the record that one of our members has been awarded the Distinguished Humanitarian Service Award of the John Howard Society of Ontario. I refer to the Honourable Senator Hastings.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: This is the highest award that the John Howard Society can bestow on anyone and, since the citation is fairly brief, I should like to read it into the record. It states:

This Award honours a man who, as a member of the Senate of Canada, has been for over 20 years, an active, knowledgeable and courageous social reformer for the legal human rights of prisoners in Canada.

This Award is made with great respect and admiration for his unwavering concern that offenders be considered as individuals. Moreover, it recognizes his responsible leadership and commitment to the cause of just and human treatment of offenders and to developing a criminal justice system that is fair and effective for all members of the community.

Honourable senators, on October 25, last Saturday, I had the privilege of attending the presentation of this honour to Senator Hastings which was held at the Couchiching Centre near Orillia, Ontario. This proved to me again something that I have noticed a number of times in this chamber—and in the House of Commons when I was there—which is that whenever a member of Parliament takes on some tasks and seems to be terrifically exercised about them, we should be very careful to look behind what he or she is doing because there may be a large number of people who are vitally concerned about and, indeed, very intensely interested in what that member of Parliament is doing. That was certainly demonstrated again to me at the presentation to Senator Hastings.

The citation says that Senator Hastings was "courageous" in doing this. I think another word is even more descriptive of what he was doing here in this chamber and, indeed, across the country, and that word is "guts." He had the guts to stand up and to put up with the scorn, or whatever the right word may be, of some of his colleagues because at one point he refused unanimous consent which, in turn, necessitated a recall of Parliament which caused severe inconvenience to a number of senators. That took some courage and, as I said, the connotation of the word "guts" more properly describes what happened.

Since I am sure a number of other senators will want to say a word, I shall be brief, but I do want to draw this distinction to the attention of all honourable senators.

I repeat that I want to offer my congratulations to Senator Hastings. I think we can all take a great deal of justifiable satisfaction and pride in what Senator Hastings has achieved.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I rise to add my comments to those of Senator Olson in offering the congratulations of senators on this side of the chamber to both the John Howard Society on its excellent choice and to our colleague, Senator Hastings, on being a very worthy recipient. I do not think that he received the award for instigating the recall of Parliament last summer but, rather, for the 20 years of distinguished service which we all recognize. I suppose he found, through most of those years, the need to speak out against authority in the advancement of the cause of the less fortunate. To that end, we on this side congratulate him.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to echo the comments of Senator Olson and Senator Nurgitz in offering my congratulations to Senator Hastings on the honour he has received from the John Howard Society of Ontario through its award of the Distinguished Humanitarian prize.

Senator Hastings is quite a guy.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Petten: Explain!

Senator Fairbairn: As we are all aware, his interests range all over the place from the area of energy, which is so vital to our province of Alberta, to his work in recent years as part of the Canadian delegation to NATO in the North Atlantic Assembly. Important as these areas are, however, perhaps nothing reflects the humanity and the character of Senator Hastings more than his single-minded crusade for fairness on behalf of a segment of our society which many Canadians and, indeed, many politicians are all too often quite happy to ignore, and I speak of all of those who are incarcerated in federal penitentiaries in our country.

I have admired and respected Senator Hastings for many years, but never more than when we travelled, along with Senator Doyle, to the prisons in western Canada, and with others of our colleagues to the prisons in the Kingston area during the study of Bill C-67 last spring, at which time we were travelling on behalf of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. In the most difficult situations and in the most uncompromising surroundings, Senator Hastings showed his great knowledge, his compassion, his humour and his common sense, not just with the prisoners but with the guards, the warden, the doctors and everyone in the prison community.

Honourable senators may not be aware that because of this work over the years Senator Hastings was, back in 1971, placed on honorary lifetime mandatory supervision by the warden of the Drumheller institution. Presumably, he is still on it. He is also known fondly as Honourable Inmate No. 11 at Saskatchewan penitentiary—something that they were pleased and proud to remind him of when we were there last spring.

Honourable senators, the reality of prison life is really incomprehensible to outsiders, and Senator Hastings, on his own initiative, has taken the trouble to learn that reality over the last 20 years. Nothing can describe his contribution better than the citation read to this house by Senator Olson.

Senator Hastings has brought honour to all of us in this chamber. I congratulate him and I sincerely urge him never to lose his interest in or cease the activity which has brought him this recognition.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, may I seize this opportunity to express my appreciation to all of my colleagues for the kind wishes expressed to me on my being presented with the Distinguished Humanitarian Service Award by the John Howard Society of Ontario. I accepted the award on Saturday night at the annual general meeting of the John Howard Society of Ontario held at the Couchiching Conference Centre. In accepting it in my own right, however justified or unjustified that might be, I did so in the name of the Senate of Canada and, in particular, in the name of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs under the chairmanship of Senator Joan Neiman. I said at the time, and I repeat it here, that of all the Canadian legislative assemblies, there is not one that is more interested in or has more knowledge of corrections in Canada than the Senate of Canada. We acquired that knowledge over the period of the past 20 years, first under Senator Goldenberg, the former chairman of the committee, when we undertook an extensive review of parole in Canada which led to reform in that area; through our examination of Bill S-31; and also through our subsequent examination of Bills C-67 and C-68 in the last session.

Over and above that, the Senate has shown its interest in corrections by going to the institutions, by talking to the on-line staff who deliver the service, and by talking to the recipients of that service, namely, the inmates. As a result, this chamber has an expertise in corrections above and beyond anything to be found in any other legislative assembly in Canada. I can only hope that we will maintain that interest in this chamber because we have the ability to examine legislation from time to time from a long term point of view and not from a short term point of view, which is the case with respect to so many legislatures.

Honourable senators, I again express my appreciation to all honourable senators. Whatever service I have been able to give as a humanitarian, and whatever effort I have been able to make, I have been able to do so in this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, October 30, 1986 I shall move:

—if it has been formed by then—be authorized to study and report upon the Consultation Paper on Training, issued by the Department of Employment and Immigration, tabled in the Senate on 11th December, 1984, and the document entitled "Employment Opportunities: Preparing Canadians for a Better Future", tabled at the First Ministers' Conference held in Regina, Saskatchewan, on 14th and 15th February, 1985;

That the papers and evidence taken on the subject and the work accomplished during the 1st Session of the 33rd Parliament be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee report no later than December 1, 1987.

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matter of bills and estimates as are referred to it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before we vote on the motion, I want to take the opportunity once again to voice my opinion that this is not the sequence in which we wanted such matters to appear before us. However, as was the case with Senator Kelly's motion earlier, so it is now in this case: Both Senators Kelly and Hastings are following the procedures that have found their way—in my opinion wrongly—into the rules of the Senate.

It was the intention that before the Senate was asked to vote on a motion regarding the spending of money by any committee, we would know roughly what that amount of money was to be before we were asked to vote on it. However, if you follow the procedures as they are presently set out in the rules, then both Senators Kelly and Hastings are quite right, because these procedures say the opposite: namely, that the chairman of a committee cannot prepare a budget and get approval or even an opinion from the Internal Economy Committee until a reference has been agreed to by the Senate.

Honourable senators, what we were trying to avoid was having to vote blindly on a motion with respect to the spending of money, and that is what we are being asked to do today. However, until the rules are corrected, I suppose we cannot object to senators' following this procedure. I am not for a moment suggesting that these senators are attempting to exploit the position. That procedure is established in the rules and they are simply following it.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, on the point of order raised by Senator Frith, I have a different reading of the rules of the Senate and of what we intended to do. It seemed to me that the discussion was to the effect that we would not initially receive budgets in the chamber. But the procedure as it now stands forces the committee to bring a budget before this chamber if money is to be spent.

Senator Frith: Yes, after we have voted on it.

Senator Molgat: No. We are not voting now; all we are saying right now to the chairmen of these committees is that these matters might be good subjects for study; now go and prepare your budget.

For example, how can Senator Kelly prepare a budget until such time as there is a committee to which he can speak? Right now, if no committee has been established, Senator Kelly is on his own and cannot call upon the advice of other members of that committee and, therefore, cannot prepare a budget. What Senator Kelly must now do is prepare a budget and have it approved by the Internal Economy Committee. After the Internal Economy Committee has dealt with that budget and approved or disapproved of it, the chairman must then place that budget before the Senate, together with the approval or the comments of the Internal Economy Committee. Then the Senate decides what it wants to do. If no expenditure of money is involved, then there is no problem.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, unfortunately, that is not what the rules of the Senate state. All a chairman of a committee has to do now is prepare a budget and take it to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy. He already has a reference, but the words used in the rules of the Senate are "The committee may report to the Senate."

What Senator Molgat has said is correct; I realize that. We arrived at the present procedures because we said, "If he does not have a committee, he cannot prepare a budget," but the result is to defeat completely the intention, namely, not to be asked to vote on the authority until the Senate has some information on the amount. We will have to find a way around that, and I will ask the Rules Committee to study the matter. We can debate it at a meeting of that committee, but, at the moment, we are voting on this motion without being able to see a budget.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Does the report of the Senate Committee on Internal Economy on budgets approved not, in effect, give the Senate an opportunity to refuse the budgets in that report?

Senator Frith: Yes, providing they do, but all that is required, according to my reading of the rules of the Senate, is that they "may report".

We would have an opportunity for debate, but what we were trying to avoid was the fact that someone could go, with authority from the Senate, to the Senate Committee on Internal Economy. That was always the problem, and the committee could say, "We think this is not right and that you are paying too much money for that." But at that point the chairman of the committee can say, "Look, I have the authority. You only have to look at this and approve it. You can make comments, but I now have the authority." It is just a matter of working out the dollars and cents. For the reasons Senator Molgat has explained, I think that is where we got it turned around.

Senator Molgat: I do not want to extend the debate now because, undoubtedly, this will be debated at the next meeting of the Rules Committee, but I would refer honourable senators to the Rules of the Senate, page 79, Appendix III, Rule 2:08 where it says, in effect, that no money can be spent until the budget has been approved by the Senate.

Senator Frith: That is quite right. We will not have an opportunity to vote on that.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I, too, do not wish to extend the debate because this can be dealt with by the committee, but I do wish to raise the following point: I think we have to be careful that the Senate Committee on Internal Economy does not substitute itself for the Senate in deciding what subjects Senate committees may study. The idea that we have to go to that committee first and get a budget approved before we have a reference from the Senate seems passing strange to me. It seems to me that the function of the Senate Committee on Internal Economy is to say: "You have a reference to study such and such. Here is your budget. We think it is out of line. You do not need to be spending this amount of money on staff, or you do not need to be spending this amount of money on this, that or the other thing." It is not for the members of that committee to tell honourable senators what should be studied or whether a committee should be formed.

Senator Frith: Of course not. We are not saying that; we are saying that we should have a vote on it. We decide and, before we vote on a budget, we should know what the amount is.

Senator van Roggen: You can always vote on the budget.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, in his capacity as Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, and ask him whether or not an agreement has been reached between the federal and provincial governments respecting the distribution of the $1 billion aid program that was announced some time ago by the government. I should remind the honourable minister that it is now nearly four weeks ago—not quite four, perhaps, but it is more than three—since I asked him about this. At that time I believe he indicated that there was a meeting, that day or the following day, of the federal and provincial Ministers of Agriculture to work on it. Since I have not heard that any agreement has been reached as to the programs and the vehicles for the delivery of this assistance program, I wonder if he could bring us up to date and tell us what progress has taken place.

I can tell the honourable senator, in answer to his question, that the government is committed to consulting very widely on this aid package and that the Minister of Agriculture will be meeting shortly with farm leaders, at their request, to discuss the package.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, I wonder if the government is seriously considering making some interim payment if it is going to take so long to reach an agreement and if the consultative process will be carrying on for what now appears to be an unacceptably long period of time. A number of farmers are hurting very badly now, and that situation has been exacerbated since we last met because there has been inclement weather for the harvest of much of the grain in many parts of Canada. This is the case not only in western Canada, it is true in Ontario as well. Can the minister advise whether or not consideration is being given to an interim payment if so much time is going to be spent in consultation?

Senator Murray: With regard to the possibility of an interim payment, I will take that question as notice.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—ALBERTA'S WITHHOLDING OF EXPORT LICENCE APPROVAL AND ALLEGED DISTINCTION BETWEEN TYPES OF GAS—ROLE OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Daniel Hays: Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations is prompted by an article in last week's Calgary Herald to the effect that the Alberta Minister of Energy has noted that his government could hold up the approval of proposed sales of natural gas. The sale in question was of 777 billion cubic feet of natural gas to Ontario by Western Gas Marketing.

Perhaps, rather than getting up again, I could ask all the questions that I am interested in receiving answers to, in sequence.

Is the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations involved, or does he expect to be involved, in problems which may arise as a result of Alberta's withholding licence approval for sales of gas outside of Alberta? The report I referred to also indicates that the minister may hold these licences up—and some of them are being held up now—to obtain federal approval for three conditions: one being that the federal government take steps to drop the 15-year reserve test on natural gas exports—that is, that we have a 15-year surplus before we approve exports of gas; the second relates to the adjacent border price test—that is, that we shall not sell to the U.S. export market at less than the Canadian price—and that it be withdrawn possibly before these approvals are granted; and the third—and I do not know how seriously to take it—is that the federal government assist or cause Manitoba to remove a tax levy on natural gas used in compressor stations.

Is the minister involved, or does he expect to be involved, in these negotiations?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): As the honourable senator has pointed out, there are a number of questions and several hypotheses involved in the presentation he has just made, and I shall have to ask for a report from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Senator Hays: The second area that I would ask the minister to check into at the same time—or perhaps he can give us an answer today—involves matters which arose last week before the Ontario Energy Board where it was stated that Alberta is developing a position to distinguish between the two types of gas used in Canada: one, the core supply—that is, to residential users; and the other the supply to users who have alternative energy sources, which means that they can switch to some other form of energy such as coal or oil. Is the federal government involved in the negotiations with Alberta to accept that kind of re-regulation of the energy industry?

Senator Murray: I must give the same answer. I shall have to obtain a report from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

DECLINE IN NATURAL GAS PRICES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H.A. Olson: Could the minister tell us if the government is simply going to stand aside and watch natural gas prices go into a free fall, knowing full well of the surplus amounts that exist and that will be going on the market in three days? Since this will probably happen later this week, perhaps he could give us a more complete answer than simply saying that he will have to make some inquiries.

BANKING

DESIGNATION OF TORONTO AS INTERNATIONAL CENTRE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate, in his capacity as Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, inform the Senate whether the government has changed its plan to start a tax war between certain provinces and cities by refusing to designate Toronto as an international banking centre, and by proposing federal tax incentives that would discriminate against Toronto?

Senator Grafstein: The Minister of Finance, Mr. Wilson, has proposed that there be certain tax measures which would provide incentives for certain cities to be international banking centres, but Toronto is not included in that particular list. The Province of Ontario, the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto and the City of Toronto have all made representations to the Minister of Finance to change this to avoid what would be a needless and quite wasteful tax war.

Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate, in his capacity as Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, will review those representations and discuss the matter with his colleague in the hope that he will change his mind.

Senator Murray: I shall be glad to discuss them with my colleague in the expectation that he will provide a report for the honourable senator.

PROPOSED NATIONAL FORUM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate in his capacity as Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations.

On October 1, in the Speech from the Throne, we were told that the government is proposing a conference on post-secondary education. The Speech from the Throne states:

To help meet the challenges facing higher education, my government will propose a national forum on post-secondary education, to be held early next year.

My question to the Leader of the Government, in his capacity as Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, is this: Have the invitations or the proposals for the national forum on post-secondary education gone forth? If so, to whom are they addressed, and what is the proposed date for the national forum on post-secondary education?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): As I said in reply to an earlier question on the subject, it is not a federal-provincial conference that we have in mind but, rather, one which would bring together the two levels of government, representatives of the post-secondary institutions, the research community and others interested in this subject to discuss the future of post-secondary education in the country.

The Secretary of State, Mr. Crombie, has begun the process by getting in touch with ministers of education in the provinces to ask for their views and advice on the holding of such a conference, the composition of such a conference and its agenda. He has indicated that he will be getting in touch with them shortly to discuss the matter.

Senator Stewart: As a supplementary question, is it anticipated that the government will be in a position to say whether this forum will take place and, if it is to take place, when it will take place? Is it anticipated that this information will be available before the end of the calendar year?

Senator Murray: I would hope so, honourable senators, although I repeat that this is not a forum over which we ourselves would necessarily preside or, indeed, convene. It is a forum which might be held under the auspices of, let us say, the Council of Ministers of Education of Canada or, perhaps, one of the other organizations, such as the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada or some similar organization.

Yes, I would hope that the consultative process would be sufficiently far advanced by the end of this calendar year that we will be able to agree on the date and composition of such a conference and its agenda.

Senator Stewart: I have a further supplementary question. As the Leader of the Government in the Senate knows, the Senate has authorized one of its standing committees to report on federal involvement in post-secondary education. Should we take it from the minister's answer that there is no reason why that committee should not proceed expeditiously to complete its studies and to make its report?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I must say that I have no advice to offer committee members on that matter since they are masters of their own agenda. I look forward to hearing from them when they are ready to report.

Senator Stewart: As early as possible.

EDUCATION

ESTABLISHMENT OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TASK FORCE ON NATIONAL STANDARDS

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have a question following on from that. Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell me whether or not he has anything to report regarding possible government establishment of the federal-provincial task force on national standards for education, as was suggested by the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth?

IMMIGRATION

STATUS OF INTERESTED LAPLANDERS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Charlie Watt: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and it relates to the area of northern Norway which suffered some fallout from the nuclear plant explosion at Chernobyl in the Soviet Union.

Approximately 100 families were very much interested in moving to Canada. Has the Canadian government been approached directly on this matter by the Laplanders? If so, what is the position of the government in this regard?

● (1440)

INDUSTRY

AEROSPACE—ALLOCATION OF CF-18 SERVICE CONTRACTS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government. On October 2, I asked him a question regarding the allocation of the contracts for the CF-18 fighter aircraft. At that time, the minister quite properly indicated to me that he was not current on the particular question but that he would find out further information. Since that time, there has been a great deal of speculation on the matter in the newspapers.

Obviously, for our province this matter is a very serious one. We have traditionally had some 10 per cent of the Canadian aerospace industry. It is an important industry for Manitoba. Could the minister provide any further information as to where that matter stands? If he cannot do so today, can he tell us when he could give us the information?

PENITENTIARIES

PROPOSED PRISON AT PORT-CARTIER, QUEBEC—FACTORS GOVERNING LOCATION—EFFECT OF ADDITIONAL COST ON INMATE PROGRAMS

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government will not be surprised to learn that my first question of the day deals with the construction of the federal corrections institution at Port-Cartier, Quebec, in the electoral district of Manicouagan. I should like to ask the government leader whether, in reaching this decision, the government—or perhaps I should say the Prime Minister—gave consideration to the fact that the construction of that institution could not be justified on the ground of need, and that the problem of overpopulation in our penitentiaries is in the Ontario region and the prairie region. Today there are 486 men double bunked in Ontario—which is 49 per cent of the Canadian total—as opposed to 236 in Quebec, or 24 per cent of the Canadian total of 1,034 inmates double-bunked.

My question to the government leader is this: In reaching that decision, was consideration given to the question as to where the need for federal institutions exists?

Senator Hastings: When he is consulting with his colleague, the Solicitor General, could the government leader ask him how many educational programs are to be abandoned, how many ETA programs are to be abandoned and how many other worthwhile inmate programs are to be abandoned in order to provide the $41 million necessary for the construction of the new penitentiary? Did the government give consideration to the abandonment of inmate programs before it made its decision?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, those questions are, to put it mildly, hypothetical. In any case, I will ask the Solicitor General what further information he can supply. But nothing that I have seen or that the honourable senator has seen suggests that the money for that particular institution is being taken out of the programs to which he has referred.

Senator Hastings: If the government leader consults with his colleague, the Solicitor General, he will learn that educational programs are being cut and that they are being cut to the extent that the prisons will only be able to offer an education up to the grade X level in the near future. That constitutes one cut. The temporary absence programs are going to be cut because there is no provision for overtime pay for the security staff on ETA programs. There is to be a general cut throughout the whole budget of the corrections service of Canada on the rehabilitation side. I repeat that the government leader will find that out when he consults with his colleague, the Solicitor General.

In view of the fact that the construction of penitentiaries is now going to be used for the benefit of economically depressed areas, as indicated by the Prime Minister, and in view of the fact that his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, now wants such an institution in his constituency, is it the intention of the government to transfer the administration of Corrections Canada to the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the expenditure restraints that the honourable senator refers to may, indeed, be taking place, but they are not connected to and are irrelevant to the construction of another penitentiary in Quebec.

In answer to the second part of the question, there is nothing new about applying socio-economic considerations in deciding where to build federal institutions, including federal correctional institutions. Some 30 years ago, another Progressive Conservative government decided to locate some new correctional institutions in Springhill, Nova Scotia, after a mine disaster there. That has been done over the years in the case of various regions that were suffering from high levels of unemployment. There is nothing in all of this that the honourable senator should find scandalous. What would be scandalous is the centralization of all federal institutions within a 30-mile radius of Ottawa, Montreal or Toronto.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Hastings: The government leader has indicated that this practice is not new. His government also built Drumheller in a depressed area. It is nothing new for his government to build institutions where they are not needed, for the benefit of the member of Parliament of that district, or the Prime Minister, as the case may be. This policy flies in the face of all of the guidelines applying to the construction of federal institutions.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator Hastings: I tell the government leader again that these cuts are being made across Canada so as to provide the $41 million for the construction of that institution.

Senator Murray: How do you know?

Senator Hastings: We know it. Consult your colleague and you will know it.

Senator Frith: Don't mess around with the expert.

DOUBLE-BUNKING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would like to pick up on one item mentioned by Senator Hastings. I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he could find out if there is a concerted study within the government to deal with the question of double-bunking in prisons. Whether anyone wants to argue the merits of the location of one prison in Quebec as opposed to elsewhere in Canada, the fact remains that double-bunking is the single most alarming issue in the prison community in this country. It is very heavily felt and will be increasingly so in the next few years in the prairies, in the Pacific region and in parts of Ontario.

Is there at present, or will there be in the near future, a concerted study made of this very risky and, in some cases, frightening situation?

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to six questions. Some of these answers are longer than others. I propose to read the name of the senator who asked the question and give a synopsis of the question itself. If honourable senators wish me to read any of the answers, I will be only too happy to do so. Otherwise, I will ask that they be taken as read.

INDUSTRY

AEROSPACE—ALLOCATION OF CF-18 SERVICE CONTRACTS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on October 2, 1986 by the Honourable Senator Molgat respecting Industry—Aerospace—Allocation of Service Contracts. This is a very short answer and reads as follows:

The allocation of service contracts for the CF-18 aircraft is presently being considered by Treasury Board. A decision is expected within the week.

ENERGY

MONITORING OF OIL AND GAS COMPANIES FOLLOWING TERMINATION OF PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 8 last by the Honourable Senator Olson respecting Energy—Monitoring of Oil and Gas Companies Following Termination of Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax.

Hon. H.A. Olson: I can read it and take it up with the honourable minister tomorrow.

Senator Doody: I ask that the answer be taken as read.

(The answer follows:)

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources met with the heads of major Canadian oil companies during the summer and early fall, prior to the removal of the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax to ensure increased cash flow resulting from the removal of the PGRT would be re-invested by the industry. At this stage, the minister is prepared to put his trust in the companies, believing that it is in their longer term interests to re-invest and to find new reserves.

Chevron, for example, has indicated the recent withdrawal of the PGRT will assist it in carrying out its $41.7 million exploration program in the Mackenzie Valley. Chevron recognizes exploration is a high risk venture but believes the long term potential of the area guarantees production once world oil prices improve and stabilize.

The Petroleum Monitoring Agency will be monitoring the changes in company spending plans that have occurred as a result of the removal of the PGRT. Following careful consideration of the various approaches available the Agency has written to the forty largest companies reporting to the Agency to arrange interviews. Through these interviews the PMA will determine the changes anticipated in the companies' spending plans occurring due to the elimination of the PGRT. The PMA has estimated the improved cash flow position of each company as a result of this single measure. The companies will be asked to give an indication of how these additional funds will be used for exploration and development and to increase employment in the energy sector. Information obtained through the Agency's regular semi-annual surveys over the next three years will indicate to what extent companies have fulfilled their commitments.

The PMA will be reporting to the minister during the monitoring process. And, as the minister indicated before the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources (October 22, 1986), when the report is received, if anything unexpected appears, the government will address the situation with the companies at that time.

SPORT

DEFINITION OF AGE OF PUBERTY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 8 last by the Honourable Senator Marsden respecting Sport—Definition of Age of Puberty. Once again, that is a rather lengthy answer and I would much prefer that it be read by somebody else.

The press coverage of this policy tended to focus on one half of the policy statement in one only of the thirteen areas covered by the policy. The statement referred to "Sport Stratification" (page 16 of the policy document) which presents Sport Canada's support of "the concept of sport programs organized on a sex-integrated basis up to the age of puberty".

Sport Canada's mandate entails provision of funding programs and services to sport organizations at the national level. Sport Canada is not directly involved in the organization or administration of sport activities at the school and community level, and indeed the federal government has no jurisdiction with respect to schools, community clubs, etc. Thus, this statement is one of philosophical support for a concept—not with the idea of enforcing anything in an area over which it has no jurisdiction, but rather with the hope of playing a leadership role in encouraging community and school leaders to integrate their programs, using a working "definition" of puberty that fits into their programming needs.

In physiological terms, it is quite clear that there is wide variation in the age at which children mature through puberty—both within and between the sexes. Therefore, there is no question of defining a specific "age" at which it occurs, nor of administering any tests related to this age, or to participation in integrated programs. All our policy is intended to say is the demonstrated differences in actual physical skill or ability should be the prime basis upon which to divide up athletes for competition. We simply do not think that the arbitrary distinction based on gender is fair or reasonable. And among pre-pubescent individuals we know that there is almost no connection between skill level and gender.

As the second part of the statement on Stratification states, we are certainly not choosing the age of puberty as the point at which integrated programs should be terminated. The policy indicates that "Beyond puberty, philosophically Sport Canada supports the concept of competitive structures based on skill level". Thus, in sports where the nature of the event, at the highest level of competition, does not warrant stratification on the basis of sex, Sport Canada encourages integrated competition at all levels, including international competition. Some examples would be some events in shooting, equestrianism and yachting. Even where there is reason for separate competition at the highest levels, perhaps because of the extent to which performance depends on such gender-related characteristics as muscle mass, et cetera, nevertheless there may be levels of participation (e.g. a recreational program) where integration would be appropriate.

PREMIER OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 8 last by the Honourable Senator Bonnell respecting the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency—Request for Text of Telex dated October 2, 1986 from Premier of Prince Edward Island.

The record of the House of Commons indicates that the telex referred to by the Prime Minister on October 6, 1986, is the same telex of October 3rd, 1986, that was tabled in this chamber on October 8, 1986.

PARLIAMENTARY EMPLOYMENT AND STAFF RELATIONS

DELAY IN PROCLAMATION OF ACT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 9 last by the Honourable Senator Frith respecting Parliamentary Employment and Staff Relations—Delay in Proclamation of Act.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That answer must be short.

Senator Doody: It is, and I will read it.

The proclamation of Bill C-45 is awaiting the approval of the House of Commons Board of Internal Economy. The Board met for the first time with the new Speaker to consider this and other matters on October 15. The bill will be proclaimed as soon as the appropriate consultations have been undertaken.

NATIONAL STATISTICS COUNCIL

MEMBERSHIP—REGIONAL REPRESENTATION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 9 last by the Honourable Senator McElman respecting National Statistics Council—Membership—Regional Representation.

(The answer follows:)

The concerns raised by the senator have been brought to the attention of the minister responsible for Statistics Canada. The minister is looking into ways to rectify the situation.

Those, honourable senators, are the six delayed answers that are available today.

Senator Frith: That is a fair start—a B-minus, I would say. How many are outstanding?

Senator Doody: I think there are six to go.

Senator Frith: Sorry, I will raise that to a B-plus.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill S-2, to implement conventions between Canada and the Kingdom of the Netherlands and Canada and Japan and agreements between Canada and the People's Republic of China and Canada and the Republic of Malta for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to implement conventions between Canada and the Kingdom of the Netherlands and Canada and Japan and agreements between Canada and the People's Republic of China and Canada and the Republic of Malta for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

The four tax conventions under review follow the general pattern of the conventions previously approved by Parliament. The number of Canadian tax treaties in force at present is 41. The conventions with Cameroon, Guyana, Kenya and Zambia, approved by Parliament in 1984, 1985 and 1986, have yet to be ratified. After their ratification, the number of conventions in force will reach 45. The total number will reach 49 once the four conventions under study are ratified.

I would like to indicate briefly the main elements of these tax treaties. The country of which the payor is a resident can withhold tax, but the rate is generally limited to 10 or 15 per cent in the case of dividends, branch tax and interest, and in the case of royalties to 10 per cent.

Under the Canada-Netherlands Double Taxation Convention, the rate of withholding tax on dividends is reduced from the statutory rate of 25 per cent to 15 per cent for portfolio dividends and to 10 per cent if the recipient is a company which owns directly at least 25 per cent of the capital of the company paying the dividends. The existing convention contains a provision allowing certain holding corporations to repatriate dividends without having to pay any withholding tax. That exemption will continue to apply for qualified corporations until December 31, 1988.

The exemption in the Netherlands for mortgage interest received from Canada will continue to apply until June 30, 1987. In addition, in the existing convention, rents for the use of, or the right to use, industrial, commercial or scientific equipment are generally exempt from the non-resident withholding tax. Such payments will be subject to a rate of 10 per cent withholding tax, but for rental agreements in existence at the time of signature of the new convention, the exemption will be maintained until December 31, 1988.

In the Tax Convention between Canada and Japan, the withholding tax rate on dividends is established at 15 per cent but is reduced to 10 per cent if the beneficial owner is a company which owns at least 25 per cent of the voting shares of the company paying the dividends during the period of six months immediately before the end of the accounting period for which the distribution of profits takes place.

In the Tax Agreement between Canada and the People's Republic of China, the withholding tax rate on dividends is reduced from 15 to 10 per cent only if the beneficial owner is a company which owns at least 10 per cent of the voting stock of the company paying the dividends.

With respect to interest, the withholding tax rate is set at 10 per cent in the case of Japan and the People's Republic of China.

Some of the other matters also dealt with in these tax treaties include capital gains. The source country—that is, the country where the property is situated—retains its right to tax capital gains derived from disposition of real property, business assets and shares in a real estate company or an interest in a real estate partnership or trust.

Under the conventions, discrimination is prohibited, but only on the basis of the nationality of the taxpayer. Accordingly, fiscal incentives, such as the small business deduction and the dividend tax credit enjoyed by Canadian residents, are not affected by the Non-Discrimination Articles.

No special concession is provided for teachers. Thus, the two-year exemption provided for under the 1957 and 1964 conventions with the Netherlands and Japan respectively will be terminated.

However, the relevant provision in the existing tax convention with Japan will continue to apply to teachers who qualify for the exemption and have entered the country before the entry into force of the new convention.

The right of Canada to tax pensions and annuities paid to non-residents is protected. Under the Income Tax Act, pension and annuity payments are subject to tax at the lesser of the statutory rate of non-resident withholding tax and the graduated personal rates. In the conventions with the Kingdom of the Netherlands and Malta, the right to tax at source is limited to 15 per cent for the periodic pension or annuity payments paid to non-residents.

War veterans' pensions as well as alimony and other similar payments are exempted.

Proper relief will be granted in each country in respect of taxes paid in the other country. In Canada, except in the case of certain dividends for which an exemption is granted, a foreign tax credit corresponding to the amount of tax paid in the other country will be allowed for the purposes of computing the Canadian tax on the income concerned. The provisions of the Income Tax Act will continue to govern the application of this foreign tax credit.

In addition, the conventions with China and Malta contain a tax-sparing provision. Tax-sparing is a technical means of ensuring that the tax incentives granted by a less-developed country will, in fact, benefit the enterprise and will not be "taxed away" by the more developed country. The tax-sparing provisions included in the conventions are similar to the ones which were approved in the conventions with other developing countries.

Senator Frith: Did you say "sparing"?

Senator Doody: Yes. It is spelled "sparing", as in "spare the rod and spoil the child."

Generally, tax-sparing is granted by Canada where a company which is a resident of Canada derives business profits, dividends or interest from the other country and such income has qualified under certain incentives in force at the time of signature of the convention. The foreign tax credit computation will take into account the amount of tax from the other country which would normally have been payable in the absence of an exemption or reduction of tax granted under specified incentive legislation.

On balance, the terms of the respective double taxation conventions provide an equitable solution to the various problems of double taxation existing between Canada and, respectively, the Kingdom of the Netherlands, Japan, the People's Republic of China and the Republic of Malta. Each of these countries hopes to implement the bilateral tax convention as soon as possible, and consequently I commend the bill to the favourable consideration of this house.

Honourable senators, I am told that these conventions are substantially the same as those which we have entered into before and which we have discussed in this chamber. However, I would have no objection to seeing this particular piece of legislation go before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for further study, if the Senate should so decide.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Hicks, debate adjourned.

FISHERIES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY FISH MARKETING IN CANADA

On the Order:

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject before the Committee during the 1st Session of the 33rd Parliament be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee report no later than September 15, 1987.—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Your Honour, we are ready to vote on that motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Cogger, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, for an Address to Her Excellency the Governor General in reply to Her Speech at the opening of the Session—(Honourable Senator Frith). (2nd day of resuming debate).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Croll.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, first, I wish to table the Senate Report on Poverty, Poverty Line Update for 1985, estimated for 1986. I believe that honourable senators have already received a copy. I ask that it be appended to today's edition of Hansard.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, the report has been issued yearly for the past 15 years. It has attained credibility and acceptability and attracted "clones". The original measure of poverty was developed some 30 years ago from two surveys. One found that the Canadian family spent approximately one third of its income on food; and the other indicated the cost of a minimal subsistence budget for food.

The minimum budget multiplied by three became the official poverty line threshold, adjusted each year for inflation and measured on the basis of cash income.

The Senate Poverty Report made changes in line with the present spending of poor people. Consideration had to be given to housing, clothing and other essentials. Ours was a new approach, and hence the clones. I shall discuss those details on another occasion.

Originally, I had intended to speak today about the elderly. I have mentioned the poverty report, so I shall add some other matters that have come to my attention. I shall discuss the details on another occasion in order to give people the opportunity to examine and appraise it.

The year is now 1971. After an extended study by devoted Senate members over a period of four years, the Senate Report on Poverty was tabled. I said then that it would remain part of the social policy debate for some considerable time, and so it has. It has attracted a great deal of attention. It became the best selling report in the history of such reports. It sold more than 30,000 copies for as high as $10 per copy. It became a reference book on poverty in every university and library in this country, and it still is. That was 15 years ago. We then recommended a guaranteed national income to replace the then welfare state, which had run its course. It had served the people well and laid the foundation for better things to come. It had become expensive, overlapping, wasteful, and here was a way to deal with it immediately. As a matter of fact, it was so ineffective that its main role was producing more customers. The then Leader of the Conservative Party, the Honourable Robert Stanfield, launched his first campaign by promising a guaranteed annual income. Unfortunately, he was not elected. The present government has taken no decision on the matter. It is not certain what position it will take. Mr. Turner, the Leader of the Liberal Party, declares he favours a guaranteed annual income, and two Liberal conventions have endorsed it.

From my point of view, the time has come for decisive action. If I may be so bold, I suggest that Mr. Turner is spending too much time trying to obtain an approval vote. I have news for him. It will be a coronation. All he needs is a computer. It is time now to put some meat into the resolution on a guaranteed annual income and to throw the full power of the leader of the party behind that resolution. The time to act is now. Unless leadership is shown, the coronation will be flawed. It is time to throw caution to the wind, and all the advisers who suggest caution and timidity are not on the ball. We need some positive action now, not tomorrow. Fifteen years have passed and now they are talking of six more years. I do not know what they have in mind, but unless they take action immediately, no one will believe what they have to say about the matter.

Let us talk about poverty. I have seen Canada change. I would remind my party to remember where they came from and to be loyal to their roots, for without their roots there is not much left. I began my public service with the hope that I could help. I remember my first act in those days in Windsor in 1929 when, as mayor, I established soup kitchens for the poor. Many people were poor and those kitchens were needed. It gives me very little pleasure, some 50 years later, to see my modern counterpart participating in food bank operations dressed in a three-piece, pin-striped suit. That is not what I had in mind originally. Somewhere the system has failed.

The concept of a guaranteed annual income has had a good debate in this country, a debate which it has passed with high marks. It has been endorsed by the National Anti-Poverty Organization, the National Welfare Council on Social Development, by Donald Macdonald, by the Fraser Institute of Vancouver and by Mr. Claude Forget, who is chairman of the committee studying the unemployment insurance system, which has not yet tabled its report, but I understand that this subject is part of it. Guaranteed income has been endorsed by every labour organization in Canada and by everybody who is anybody in the country, except governments who lack the fortitude it takes to handle the problem. It is a terrific administrative problem. There is no mistake about that, and I can understand the hesitation. However, we as a country have painted ourselves into a corner. I shall explain what I mean by that comment in a few minutes.

I never said at any time that the recommendation was made to save money. It was made for the purpose of distributing wealth and of filling gaps, of helping single women, widows, minimum wage earners and the silent and forgotten ones. To provide a guaranteed income would take a great amount of administrative skill. It will require will, guts, desire and a great deal of imagination. It will involve the provinces, the municipalities, the 27,000 employees of welfare organizations whose jobs cannot be at risk, and voluntary groups. I know that you are saying to yourselves, "Well, Senator Croll, we spent a lot of money establishing our social system." I agree. It is firmly recorded in my mind, and I have never forgotten, that there were some who, from the very first day, opposed the Old Age Pension on three grounds: Its constitutionality was always one of the first. Then it was said that we did not have a mandate. Third, it was said that we could not afford it. Those objections were raised against almost every social measure that we dealt with in those days.

However, what started out as $10 per month now comes to all of us who are fortunate enough to have lived long enough to collect it as $294 per month. That, at least, was my last cheque, and the country is not, to my knowledge, going bankrupt as a result of it.

However, honourable senators, I have news for you; news that is a little startling: Of the ten industrial nations in the world, we are not number one in social expenditure: We are number eight. I think it is time we stopped crying. Let me just say this, and I am talking to the country as a whole and not to any specific political party: We find ourselves with two competing welfare systems. As I said earlier, we have painted ourselves into a corner. We have one welfare system under the Canada Assistance Act, which is of a permanent nature. Now we find we have another welfare system of a temporary-permanent nature and that is the Unemployment Insurance fund. That program has taken a special position in the hearts of the communities in the poorer provinces and has become vital to their assistance and their welfare. Today, honourable senators, they are drawing on the Unemployment Insurance fund. As I said, we now have two systems running in tandem. Unless we do something, and quickly, we will be stuck with these two systems for years to come.

Honourable senators, the only thing to do is to roll these systems back, and it can be done. No matter what the recommendations of the Forget commission study on Unemployment Insurance, it will be impossible for any political party or any government to hack away at those benefits or, in fact, to sever them. These people are dependent on that fund for their bread and butter and, no matter which government is in office, no one will interfere seriously with these benefits. Therefore, I suggest that the only alternative is to do what the fishermen and others in some of these places are doing on their own. They have arranged things so that they fish half the year, and the other half of the year they draw unemployment insurance. They have, in effect, a guaranteed income, and I say good luck to them. If it is our intention to withdraw unemployment insurance benefits from the people who depend on that fund for part of their annual income, then we must replace that benefit with something else.

As I said before, we should stop crying. I recall that those who supported Medicare said, at that time, that that was the last of the great social benefits that we would have to deal with; that there would be none that would follow. I think they were mistaken. We must begin to put into effect a guaranteed income or we will get ourselves into a terrible situation which no one will enjoy. In my opinion, we need to deal with that situation immediately.

When I started out to speak today, honourable senators, I intended to talk about the elderly, and I got side-tracked. I just want to make sure that my party is not led to believe that they can wait for tax reform before they can deal with the guaranteed income, or that they can wait for years before they deal with it. This is an immediate problem and it must be dealt with on that basis.

[Senator Croll.]

As I said, I started out originally to talk about the elderly. I think the elderly have a priority problem in this country today. For the elderly, this is the age of nostalgia. Almost everything in the past is seen through the rosy glass of selective memory. The good old days are celebrated as though nothing could match their splendour. Let me tell you, as a survivor of those early days, they were not all that great. Half of the people lived in poverty; the unemployment rate sometimes averaged 28 per cent; wages were low and the hours of work were brutally long. There was no minimum wage. I remember, in 1935 I introduced the first minimum wage law for men in Canada. That action attracted national attention and even attracted American attention. I had no idea that my measure was so important at that time. The five-day work week was a theory. Most people worked six days and had Sunday as their day of rest. There was no such thing as Medicare, or even health insurance plans. There was no such thing as family allowance, and unemployment insurance was not dreamt of.

To help the elderly, an old age pension of meagre amount was proposed, and for a year it was bitterly resisted, despite the stringent means test that came with the proposal. It was said that such payments would bankrupt the country. Only a fortunate few of the old people had retirement pensions. Most older people kept on working until age or infirmity stopped them, and then they retired to poverty. It was not, however, the poverty that we know today. The poor and their children had shabby clothes and worn-out shoes. They had poor housing and both looked and were hungry. It was a society that left many of its citizens without decent incomes, especially in their twilight years. It was a society that did not seem to care. At that time, I entered public life because I thought I could help.

We have come a long way since the bad old days of the depression, but there are many more miles to go. It has been wisely said that it is wrong for those who have made it up the ladder to pull the ladder up after them. No one really makes it alone. We all achieve whatever our talents and character make possible only because the institutions of a democratic society create an environment of opportunity.

In those days, only a handful of the elite went to the universities in Canada. Even in the late 1930s there were only 40,000 students enrolled in the universities, or less than 5 per cent of Canadians between the ages of 18 and 24. Fifty years later, more than 400,000 students were enrolled.

Honourable senators, these are different times and this is a different and better country. It is a country with problems, but not without compassion. Today, the network of social legislation has been helping the helpless in Canada over the past half-century. We have not yet achieved Utopia in this country but we have come a long way since the bad old days of the depression.

With respect to the elderly, honourable senators, there is one thing I would like to say. It is to the credit of all of us that, over the period of years since I have been in this chamber, we have brought the elderly up from the basement and down from the attic and we have brought them to the main floor. However, somehow or other, we have abandoned them, or at least we have stopped looking after them in the way that we should. We have given them no new direction; we have provided for them on a paltry scale. What we need today, and need very badly, is someone to take a special interest in them. In fact, we need a department for the elderly in this country. Most people do not understand how governments operate and what is happening in this country. For example, they do not know that lobbies have become a very important force in our legislative life. Lobbies are now a familiar force in Ottawa. Many of them serve legitimate interests; others serve issues and interests not so legitimate. There is nothing wrong with lobbies in principle. They can often bring real concerns and useful points of view to the attention of our lawmakers.

However, the principle is flawed. Lobbying is an expensive activity and only the most affluent special-interest groups can make the most of it.

Meanwhile, there are 2,500,000 Canadian men and women sharing the same interests and problems who have no lobby. No one speaks for them collectively in Ottawa, and the government makes no attempt to concentrate the services it provides to them. I refer to the 10 per cent of the Canadian people who are over the age of 65.

These older Canadians have shown they do know how to lobby. They did so only once, but with tremendous impact, when the issue of de-indexing their old age security led to an upsurge of public opposition that stopped the government cold. Where are they now? Well, they are at home.

We still have no one federal department in which all services to older Canadians are concentrated. Economic, social and retirement programs for the elderly are scattered and uncoordinated. Why are these services not brought into focus? Besides striking a blow for efficiency and cost-saving, it would bring new respect and dignity to the fastest-growing sector of our society. That is urgently needed.

I would be the last Canadian to minimize the importance of the Department of Veterans Affairs; I think all veterans are special, but ex-servicemen and women are now a dwindling minority whose members are now mostly in the over-65 age group. Their concerns, other than those directly related to their war-time service, are the same as the rest of Canada's older people. There are 65,000 veterans in Canada and they have a powerful lobbying force in the Royal Canadian Legion and other similar organizations, while other older Canadians have neither a department nor a lobby to speak for them.

Older people showed their potential for political clout when they beat back the attempt to remove the protection that indexing gave their pensions. The public response to their hastily-organized campaign was stunning in its impact. I call for a rekindling of that spirit of political action. I urge the formation of a national organization to speak for older people on major issues, an organization that could be a major force in the making of policy decisions affecting the elderly. Such an umbrella organization could be funded by individual dues as modest as a dollar a year. An initial membership of even one out of every five older Canadians would provide a half-a-million-dollar annual budget. This organization could address provincial and regional issues as well as those of Canada-wide concern. A small central office and a continuing newsletter or similar publication could keep members in touch with major concerns.

While much has been done to remove the extremes of poverty in Canada, we still have our own Third World situations in this country. Only one in every ten retiring Canadians receives a full private pension. The elderly still form a high proportion of the invisible poor. They need the dignity that comes from having their voices heard in the political forum. There are powerful organizations that speak for manufacturers, lawyers, physicians and accountants. No one speaks for our elderly people, although they far outnumber all those other groups combined.

I say that a department dealing with policy for the aged is an urgent national need. As long as that need is neglected, we will have nursing home scandals and other examples of exploitation of the elderly. The greying of Canada is an accelerating process, along with the potential for political action. A national organization of the aged could light a fire in Ottawa that would ignite the conscience of all Canadians. Older Canadians have tested their strength once, and they can do so again and again. If the right pressure is applied, the federal government can bring about the overdue consolidation of agencies and services for the elderly which now operate in fragmented fashion.

The greatest need is not new money but dignity, communication and national respect. Older people must not let themselves be shut out of the political process. Their participation would be of benefit to all of us.

It was Ontario-born economist John Kenneth Galbraith who correctly pointed out that today's poor are the first in history not to be seen, the first poor the politicians could safely leave alone. Much the same can be said of the elderly if they pass up the opportunity for political organization. In demographic terms, they could be a new force in public affairs.

Our world is vastly different from the one I knew as a child. At the turn of the last century, the average life span was 49 years; 50 years earlier, few countries had an average life expectancy of more than 40 years, and the average working life was only 20 years. Today, many people may be at their peak at 65 or 70. We have to redefine "old age."

The extension of the average working life has been even more significant than the improvement in mortality figures. It has more than doubled the lifetime earning potential of Canadians and greatly increased our national productivity. Most of this was accomplished by people who are now in the over-65 sector. Other Canadians might well say, "We owe them." But what do we owe them? No one is appealing for great amounts of extra money, just a readjustment of present spending to make it more productive. For that, we must encourage the elderly to organize on their own behalf. If I sound emotional about this, it is because emotional involvement is just as important as financial aid. Compassion, dignity, respect and love are all emotional needs of the elderly, needs that money alone cannot satisfy. These are the people who created our national heritage in long years of work, depression and war. Many of them missed out on the rewards that today's younger Canadians take for granted.

Older Canadians are not complainers. They rarely protest or demonstrate or form picket lines. They are the silent ones in a society that gives them occasional—and patronizing—notice, but generally ignores them as a political presence. Many of the poorest among them are elderly women who live alone; three out of four of them live below the poverty line. Our welfare system has become “womanized” for some reason or other, and that is a regrettable thing in our society. These are the people who would be helped the most by an organization of the aged, an organization that could end their condition of invisibility. These women are often victims of a social condition; most men die while married, while older women mostly die alone. Men tend to marry women their junior in years, and female longevity has increased, so that on average women tend to out-live their spouses by several years.

Moreover, fewer women in their time were in the work force and, therefore, there are few of them who receive employment pensions, or, if they do, the pensions are meagre. No wonder elderly women have become the poorest of the poor. They live and die quietly, unnoticed by the society that benefited from their work—tea and toast, tea and toast!

As the proportion of older people in the Canadian population increases, it can be predicted with some certainty that pressures will arise to restrict both the principle of universality and the full indexing of public pensions. Retired federal public servants have formed their own organization to make a case for protecting their pensions. The rest of the elderly would be wise to note their example and join in forming a larger organization to fight for the rights of all.

Each dying day in their lives, older people are reminded of their economic isolation and their political unimportance. They have it in their hands to do something about this lack of recognition through participation. They are not just percentages and long columns of numbers and statistical reports, they are the men and women who made this country. They have shown their capability for social action. Surely, we must give them encouragement to do so again, and in that way all Canadians will benefit.

Now I want to wrap up my speech in a way that I have never had a chance to here before. I now speak for the “hungry ’30’s,” the “’30’s generation.” I was there; I participated. What came out of that generation? Well, we were all poor; we did not have much. We shared. We went for our assistance to the churches, to the clubs and to the women’s auxiliaries. When they could not carry it any more, then, of course, we turned to the government. We provided the $30 pension, the first pension, under very similar circumstances, but we did do something about it in the 1930s to help ourselves. We continued to improve it as we went along—it was never enough—but the governments helped it along.

I also want to talk for the generation of the ’40s. I was there; I participated. The ’40s and ’50s gave us universality and family allowance. I know some of you people are not very warm to universality. It is a mistake not to be. I’ll tell you why. Universality is fairness. The woman upstairs receives the same as the woman downstairs. The bank director receives the same as the chauffeur who drove him there. That is an important concept; I like the feel of it. Perhaps we are wasting some money on the rich—it isn’t a great deal, but we are—but look at what we are doing: We are giving the middle class, the important people in our society, a few dollars on the side. They never get any deductions, and they never get any free drinks on the company. They have very little. This is one of the ways in which we help them somewhat. Some may want to bring it to an end so that one year a person may be a middle-class earner, and the next year he hasn’t any money so he has to reapply. Well, I think it is a great mistake if you interfere with it in the slightest.

Then, of course, in the ’70s we introduced the Canada Pension Plan. I was on that committee. We got a bad deal on that due to then Premier Davis of Ontario. If we didn’t agree to the lower return, we would not have had any plan at all. So we had to agree, but it has been hard to increase. On the Canada Pension Plan, we pay 2 per cent. There is not an industrial country in the world that pays less than 5 per cent—and some of them pay as high as 9 per cent—but those provinces won’t let you raise that income, they are always crying. However, my generation brought that about.

In the ’70s, my generation brought about Medicare. It certainly was the best of the lot. Despite the fact that we have not completed some things that we need to do, Medicare is the best possible social measure we have on our books at the present time. Medicare is important, but equally important will be the guaranteed income which will do away with problems people can have when they are well, just as Medicare deals with problems when people are not well.

I want to take the opportunity to say to you people of the ’70s: What have you done on social security, really? There hasn’t been one new thing or one new suggestion in the ’70s. You have applied band-aids to the various programs, and you have done very well. As a matter of fact, I am jealous of the fact that, in the last Parliament, you passed a bill that deals with flexible retirement age, improved disability, extended pension splitting upon retirement, improved combined benefits, and will soon handle a homemaker’s pension and survivor’s benefits. I am very jealous of you on the other side because we have been trying to get that across to our party for years; it just didn’t seem to make an impact.

Well, I am really telling you what we did. I think it is time that you did something, and I do not know of anything better that you can do for the future of this country than to deal with the matter of a guaranteed annual income as quickly as you can—if it doesn’t come into effect tomorrow, then the next day—in order to provide people with the minimum living standards, all of which they are entitled to. That is all I have to say at the present time.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I am pleased today to rise to make some modest contribution to the debate on the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

First, I would like to congratulate Senator Croll. However, I have a brief criticism. He implied somewhere in the middle of his speech that the elderly do not have people to speak out for them. I think that Senator Croll—

Senator Croll: I said, "collective spokesmen."

Senator Nurgitz: Oh, collective spokesmen.

Senator Croll: Yes, that is what I said.

Senator Nurgitz: Well, I am not so certain, Senator Croll, that they need collective spokesmen. I think you are a very able spokesman for the elderly, as you have been for many other disadvantaged people over the years. We on this side certainly congratulate you on that.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Nurgitz: I should like to congratulate Senators Cogger and Barootes, the mover and seconder, on their outstanding contribution. I was not in attendance on the day they spoke, but I have read both of their speeches, as I have read the concerns of some friends opposite, and I must say that, in spite of some of the comments, I thought they were well considered, intelligent speeches by two thoughtful Canadians.

I have had the pleasure of knowing Senator Cogger for the last 15 or 20 years, and I agree with my leader, Senator Murray, when, several weeks ago, he commented on the credentials of Senator Cogger. I, too, look forward to his contribution in this chamber.

Senator Barootes comes from that same part of the world as I do, western Canada, and, while I knew him somewhat before he arrived, as I am sure is the case for many of us here, I have come to know him better over the last two years. I am finding, as I am sure all of you are, that he is a man of great charm and sensitivity, and I am certain the experience he had as a medical doctor whom his peers saw fit to appoint President of the Canadian Medical Association and, generally, his contribution in his own community in Saskatchewan will stand him in good stead. I am saying that because he is my roommate and he wrote this.

Senator Frith: End of quotes!

Senator Nurgitz: I should also like to congratulate Senator Barootes. He was not with us in the last few weeks; he was back in his own province on some other endeavours. He was accompanied by his audience, Senator Steuart. I believe they both succeeded in what they set out to do.

I should also like to offer my congratulations and good wishes to my former seat-mate, Senator Murray, on his elevation. I want to mention to Senator Tremblay that he is indeed in a very good position. Honourable senators will recall that during my first five years in this chamber I had as my seat-mate Senator Charbonneau who was elevated to the position of Speaker in September of 1984. My next two years were spent sitting next to Senator Murray and he is now government leader in this chamber.

Senator Frith: Just another effort by the rainmaker! Senator Tremblay is next.

Senator Nurgitz: I do not make rain but sometimes a little shower. We have many things to look forward to from Senator Tremblay.

Senator Frith: You should sell that seat.

Senator Nurgitz: I would like to sell the seat.

Senator Murray's is a most deserving appointment and I know all honourable senators applaud it and wish him well. As we have seen over the last month and a half or so, he is performing and will perform his duties at a standard which is always displayed in this chamber.

While speaking of standards displayed in this chamber, I regret that Senator Roblin is not present because I should like to make some brief comment about him. Senator Roblin, as some of you may know, was my political mentor. He served with great distinction in his home province of Manitoba. As a fellow Manitoban, I am very proud of his service in this chamber. I would like to mention in passing that I am sure there is still a good deal to hear from Senator Roblin. He may have left the leadership of this side of the chamber, but he has not left the chamber and he still has several years here.

Honourable senators, I look forward to working with our newest colleague and friend, Senator Atkins, who is an old and dear friend of mine. I am sure he has much to contribute to the country and to this chamber.

I am pleased that my old sidekick and chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is back in her seat. Senator Neiman is near and dear to many of us, especially those of us who are members of that particular committee. You will all know the kind of leadership that she has always provided. We are pleased with her quick recovery and I am sure that I speak for all committee members when I say that we missed her and are indeed happy to have her back.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I was pleased that reference was made in the Throne Speech to a topic of concern to those of us serving on the committee which Senator Neiman chairs, and that is the question of child abuse and neglect.

In Roman times, history tells us that the father of the child had great power over that particular child—even the power of life and death. English mediaeval law introduced a concept whereby a father had an obligation to care for his children. In the 18th and 19th centuries, children, under English common law, were still regarded as mere chattels.

As the law evolved—the law which we inherited in this country—parents had three basic duties which were: one, to maintain the child; two, to protect the child; and three, to provide some educational service to that child. Of course, as a result of that, there was an obligation on the child to submit to the authority of the parent.

Children's rights have been very slow in evolving in most of the world, and this is certainly true of North America. It has only been since around the turn of the century that we have had legislation to protect children. It is interesting that the first real cause was taken up in the city of New York in 1871 when a social worker, who found some children in abject neglect and in dire circumstances, could not fight a case to take custody of those children. That social worker was not able to find assistance until, finally, after exploring every avenue, some help was offered by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. As a result of that first initiative in 1871 in the city of New York, there was formed, for the first time, a society for the prevention of cruelty to children. That was a forerunner to a society formed in the city of Toronto around the turn of the century, the first in Canada, called the Children's Aid Society.

Around the turn of the century, my province introduced a Child Welfare Act. This type of legislation came under varying names in different provinces. These laws were really the first challenge to parents' absolute right over children. The state recognized an obligation to protect children.

It is interesting to note that even today the evidence of a child has limited acceptance without independent corroboration. It obviously had much less weight at the turn of the century so that evidence of a real beginning of awareness of child abuse came as a result of the findings of radiologists. Since the law indicated that you could not convict on the uncorroborated evidence of a child, and because children were wary of complaining, especially about parents, the first stories of child abuse came about as a result of the evidence of radiologists who had found old fractures on x-rays. It was not until the 1930s that we saw some evidence of this and doctors started discussing this problem.

In 1946, there was a revelation of a good deal of child abuse in the United States. I refer to an American paper by a prominent pediatrician by the name of Dr. John Caffey who first spoke the words, "baby-beating syndrome." This article which was published in the United States refers to many instances of multiple fractures all brought about as a result of this problem of child abuse.

The publicity generated in the United States about child abuse in the 1960s led to the enactment of legislation in that country requiring medical doctors and others to notify authorities. To that end we, too, have a variety of acts in provincial statutes which impose varying degrees of requirement on the part of the medical community and others to report instances of what we now call child abuse.

In 1974, the U.S. Child Abuse Convention and Treatment Act created, in that country, a national centre on child abuse and neglect—an institution which provides grants to states and agencies for child abuse programs as well as for research. It has served well in the U.S. as a means by which to study the connection between child abuse and delinquency, teen-age prostitution and wife battering, which, indeed, are all problems in this country as well.

It is interesting to note that the House of Commons Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs issued a report on child abuse and neglect in July 1974 indicating that a registry ought to be established on a provincial, not federal, basis. One begins to get into the whole constitutional argument about property and civil rights within the provinces and the reasons for which information gathering cannot be compelled on a national basis. The Badgley committee, for example, which reported in 1983 or 1984, found that to be an ineffective, inefficient and, as a result, an unhelpful way to report these matters.

Honourable senators, child abuse and neglect is as life-threatening as many other problems and it is clear from all of the evidence that a central registry for all of Canada is mandatory. Such a registry would assist in the obtaining of global statistics on the nature and extent of the problem in order to assist governments to plan and program effectively, as well as to provide child protection workers with information from other local or provincial protection agencies where a child has been previously reported to one of them. Needless to say, it would also facilitate research in child protection by making basic data uniformly available to bona fide researchers.

We have the problem in this country now where some provinces have large numbers of what appear to be child abuse cases while other provinces do not. This does not reflect a disparity in the occurrence of these events as much as it reflects a disparity in what each province considers to be an abuse. My thoughts on the matter, therefore, are that if we have one uniform method of reporting, we would be able to provide uniform statistics that are helpful to researchers.

In some provinces, sexual abuse cases are on the increase by as much as 60 and 70 per cent over previous years. I do want to be fair about that statistic in saying that, when one speaks to workers in this field, one will find that there is at present a better awareness of these abuses and a greater willingness on the part of people to talk about them and to report them—a willingness that I regret to say was not there years ago.

Whether one reads the Badgley report, the national police force survey or even such reports as those issued by the child protection centre in my home city of Winnipeg, it is abundantly clear that the total number of sexual offences involving children is, in the words of Badgley, "alarmingly high," and that they are committed so frequently and against so many persons that there is an evident and urgent need to afford victims greater protection than is now being provided.

There have been many surveys done over the past number of years, both those commissioned by the current government and, indeed, those commissioned by the previous government under the auspices of both the Department of Justice and the Department of National Health and Welfare, all necessitated by the lack of information about the actual incidents of sexual offences. Apparently, without this kind of data, it is difficult to get to the root of the problem. In a moment or two I will deal with the need for a national centre on child abuse and neglect, but, in the meantime, I should like to raise with honourable senators some very startling statistics. These have been taken from the Badgley commission report.

The first such statistic is that at some time during their lives, one in two females and one in three males has been a victim of unwanted sexual acts. These unwanted sexual acts include being threatened, being touched and attempted or completed sexual assaults. Over 80 per cent of those incidents took place when the children were under the age of 18 years.

While all of this is both alarming and frightening, one of the major problems is that, in the majority of the cases, assistance is not sought. In fact, to use the words of police authorities, assistance is sought on an irregular basis. This stems from many factors, not the least of which is shame or blame, embarrassment to the family, a feeling of guilt on the part of the child, the general taboo of not speaking about sex, and, of course, the difficulty with the law itself in that, in most of these instances, there is a requirement for corroborative evidence in order to convict. Quite apart from the need to treat victims of this kind of abuse, that latter point could be dealt with expeditiously and would go a long way towards assisting with these problems if an amendment to those laws of evidence were introduced which would remove the necessity for corroboration in many instances of abuse cases.

Honourable senators, the special needs and vulnerability of children must be better protected by a strengthened criminal law. I applaud the Badgley report for its recommendation that we must be more precise in targetting forbidden conduct and, further, that we must better communicate to the public both the forbidden conduct and the deterrents to it.

Again, I point out that all of the amendments to the substantive sections of the law either sharpening the focus on various offences against children or, indeed, creating new ones, will be to no avail unless the laws relating to evidence are also amended. It is interesting to note that not only did the Badgley report make strong recommendations in this regard but the Fraser report did so as well. That report recommended that reform of the criminal law of itself is insufficient unless we can get into that situation where the offence can be proven in court. Needless to say, we are all aware that these situations take place, by and large, in private circumstances, and that often one is really left only with the evidence of the child.

The law as it now stands has the fundamental assumption that a child's evidence is inherently unreliable. One would hope that in the re-introduction of the amendments to the Criminal Code, we will find amendments of this nature that will deal with a child's testimony not on the basis of admissibility. A child's evidence, like anyone else's evidence, ought to be weighed fairly.

Returning to the question of root cause and the provision of proper care and treatment to victims, in my view there is a requirement for some form of national organization with an ability and a willingness to gather information on a national basis. I am proud to say that, in my home city of Winnipeg, there has been established the Children's Hospital Child Protection Centre. This centre has provided outstanding service, initially in the core area of Winnipeg and now extended somewhat beyond that because of the crying need for it. It is a tribute to the dedicated people in that centre that young people in Winnipeg are being mended in the hope and expectation that they, too, will have the opportunity for a future. The problem, honourable senators, is one involving run-aways and teen-age suicides. Much is now being learned of child abuse as the very root of both of those tragic circumstances—there are times when, in the child's view, his only alternative is to run away or to commit suicide. In addition, we have in this country thousands of missing children.

I should like to mention briefly that the Winnipeg centre is a unique experience in terms of inter-agency cooperation; that is, it attempts to take the services of the police, of social agencies, of welfare agencies and of various community agencies and integrate them in attempting to deal with the root of this problem. I need not say that this centre, like many others of its kind in the country, is both underfunded and understaffed. One would hope that the government, in reviewing the whole question of child abuse and neglect, will see the need for some national centre so that there will be equality across this country in providing services to victims. It is clear that because not all provinces have such services, there are needless disparities. A national centre would remove such disparities and would provide a uniformity in reporting by way of national statistics.

I would hope that, with a greater awareness of the problem, we could provide national platforms for discussion and analysis for those problems relating to child abuse and neglect through the sharing of this information with people from all across the country. We must provide continuity in the role of child advocacy by the state for children who are deprived in some cases of their primary source of advocacy—their parents.

We must urge governments at all levels—municipal, provincial and federal—to assist in the funding of a national centre or a national committee from which would flow the obvious: research projects and better systems of collecting and analysing research data.

Honourable senators, child abuse and neglect is a major national concern that threatens the well-being of children and the integrity of the family. It requires our attention and the attention of the government.

On motion of Senator Sinclair, debate adjourned.

FISHERIES

INTERIM REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, October 7, 1986:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Interim Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries, tabled in the Senate on 2nd October, 1986.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to comment on the interim report of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries, tabled in the Senate on October 2, 1986.

First, I wish to pay a compliment to the members of the committee for their support during our visit to the three prairie provinces and the Northwest Territories, where we conducted our investigation and examination of the freshwater fishery. I am sure that I speak on behalf of the members of the committee when I say that we are indebted to the various interested parties across Canada who provided well over 40 submissions on the marketing of fish in Canada. I apologize to them for not having the report available sooner. I am sure that I speak on behalf of the committee when I express my gratitude to the staff, who were untiring in their efforts in preparing the report and in helping us with the examination. When the final report is presented next year, we will pay our respects in a more definitive manner.

The freshwater fisheries constitute an important industry in Canada, having harvested approximately $100 million worth of fish, in market value, in 1982-83. Of course, we should qualify that by saying that it is of minimal importance to the national economy, and even to the respective provincial economies, when compared with the fisheries of the east and west coasts. We must remind ourselves, however, that some remote communities in the north are more dependent on commercial fishing than are communities in some Atlantic provinces. In many locations up to 90 per cent of fishermen are of native origin, and the industry is important to them from the point of view of their isolation, lack of transportation and other amenities. Often commercial freshwater fishing is the only hope that local communities have for moving their economies in the direction of self-sufficiency.

I might say that it was very pleasant for the committee to visit not the provincial capitals of the provinces but the northern and more isolated communities, which enabled fishermen there to speak to a parliamentary committee. I refer to places such as Hay River in the Northwest Territories, Lac La Biche, Alberta, La Ronge, Saskatchewan, and Thompson, Manitoba. It was most gratifying to note the appreciation they had for our reaching into those small communities to discuss their problems.

Under "organization", there are two regimes handling the marketing of freshwater fish. One is referred to as the free enterprise system, which operates in Ontario, and the single-desk selling system, which operates in the west under the aegis of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation.

Senator Frith: What was that term?

Senator Marshall: "Single-desk selling." They produce 97 per cent of both the landed value and quantity of freshwater fish harvested in Canada.

The establishment of the FFMC in 1969 ushered in a new era for the freshwater fish industry. Prior to the consolidation and centralization of processing and marketing, the vast western region was much like the open, fragmented and competitive system which characterizes the Ontario region today.

In theory, centralized single-desk selling in a geographically-dispersed area of the fishery ensures the most rational marketing at every level of the industry and the best and most stable prices possible for the fishermen's catches. During the committee's hearings, some concerns were raised with respect to the conduct of the operation of the FFMC. For example, demands were made for more local processing to create employment in local communities and reduce transportation costs and delays which could affect quality in getting the product from lakeside to the market. But, generally speaking, most concerns were not about the fundamental principle that the corporation represents.

Some fishermen, for example, in the Northwest Territories voiced strong opposition to the FFMC's role in the region. They maintained that the sales of their higher quality whitefish subsidized the returns of fishermen from other FFMC regions. The report proposed the classification of that species of fish according to quality grades. Rather than throw them all into one basket and get the same price for all of the fish, they would prefer that they be graded for quality so that the fishermen who have good quality control and who look after the fish would get a better price.

With regard to the desire of the Northwest Territories fishermen to be exempted from the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation completely, the committee proposed a pilot project designed to assess whether private enterprise has a role to play in revitalizing the fisheries of the Northwest Territories for certain species of fish. They are contained in recommendations 13(a) and 13(b). The report says:

Witnesses and participants in this investigation expressed strong feelings about the advantages of either single-desk selling or a free enterprise marketing system. As the two systems were developed in response to the needs of the time, however, it is the Committee's considered opinion that there is more to be gained by improving the existing systems than by changing them completely.

I must stress that there was strong objection in the Northwest Territories, because of their vastness and isolation, that the FFMC is not doing the proper job for them, and I understand that a member of the other place, Dave Nickerson, has introduced a private member's bill to get rid of the FFMC. However, I do not believe that the committee found that to be the case. However, the FFMC could improve its marketing, and that has been recommended in our report.

To date, the management of the FFMC has been largely responsive to the needs of approximately 3,500 licensed fishermen spread out over an area encompassing approximately 5.34 million kilometres. So honourable senators can imagine the difficulties they are under regarding transportation, and so on. The FFMC is certainly not satisfactory to all of those involved, but it would be something of a miracle if it were.

It should be noted that more latitude in marketing fish for intra-provincial trade has been allowed to fishermen in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. That is a positive step which should increase fresh fish consumption at the local level. In short, it is hoped that the FFMC will continue to evolve, as all such operations must, so that all concerned will continue to be well served.

With regard to consumption, although more Canadians are eating more seafood than ever before—I believe that the per capita consumption is 16 pounds per year—the Canadian freshwater fishing industry is losing rather than capitalizing on this growing market. The proportion of freshwater fish consumed in Canada decreases as seafood consumption increases. Observers, however, believe that the trend toward increased marketing of fresh fish at the retail level could increase domestic sales of fish and fishery products by up to 50 per cent.

With regard to markets, despite the tremendous potential for domestic growth, foreign sales have been more important to the industry as a whole. Canadian channels of distribution would appear to be less developed than those in the United States. Only 15 per cent of the product is sold in Canada. Most exports go to the United States where prices are generally higher, in Canadian dollar terms. But our prospects south of the border rest on an uncomfortable and narrow base. Canada's freshwater fish exports do not figure prominently if one considers overall U.S. freshwater fish production. In addition to commercial landings of natural stocks, a substantial quantity of freshwater fish—approximately 156 thousand tonnes—particularly catfish—is produced in the United States through aquaculture, and we are producing only 50 thousand tonnes. Aquaculture is one of the world's fastest growing industries. Competitively priced fish, such as Norwegian-farmed salmon, are already making impressive inroads into the market.

The game plan that makes most sense is for the industry to build up its sales at home. There is a lot at stake for Canada, such as the retention of revenue and jobs. A stronger domestic market would also be a good ballast should protectionist measures in the United States be brought to bear on the Canadian industry. Canada should be taking these necessary steps to protect its freshwater fishing industry. Complacency in the current circumstances is certainly a recipe for disaster.

The development of fish and seafood sales in the large retailing chains is a most important factor in attracting Canadian consumers to freshwater fish. The industry must pursue its markets, aggressively seeking the opportunities they offer. Improvement in packaging, merchandising, new promotions, innovative retail fish displays and so on are needed to achieve deeper penetration in the Canadian market.

Fish teem with nutrients that keep us healthy. As researchers study the significance of these elements, they discover more benefits than had previously been suspected. But using the health angle in promotion is not enough. I must say that the health angle has become a very marketable element of the fishery as a whole. We gathered some very important material on which I would like to introduce an inquiry some time in the next few weeks.

An emphasis on quality improvement and image enhancement is the key ingredient in marketing Canadian freshwater fish, both domestically and internationally. The Canadian name on a product has to bring automatic recognition of top quality. World leaders, such as Norway, have successfully achieved this recognition for their product in the United States through regular advertising in the media.

As outlined in the report, an association representing the industry should be formed, with the help of government, for the purpose of developing an effective generic advertising campaign to promote the consumption of Canadian freshwater fish. I do not think that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is doing enough in generic advertising. For example, Alaska spent $2 million in promoting salmon out of a total advertising budget of around $7 million. Canada was spending $7 million on advertising, but it did away with the expenditure and directed funds into the industry itself, I understand.

Under the aspects of supply, it appears that would-be consumers of freshwater fish in Canada face a scarcity of fish year round. Obviously, you cannot sell fish unless you have the fish to begin with. The development of winter fishing in Northern Ontario may provide a solution to the fisheries' long-term supply problems. It may even out the highly seasonal nature of its marketing pattern.

In the west, the FFMC faces the problem of holding large inventories of species that have limited marketability, and must often freeze products which would fetch better prices if sold fresh. In this respect, the report encourages the implementation of variable pricing on a larger scale than at present to control surges in delivery as well as quality levels.

The committee received representations with regard to problems between the freshwater fishery and the recreational fishery, and the matter of the recreational fishery needs to be mentioned. How to allocate stocks between recreational and commercial fishermen was a question raised on many occasions in the western region. It would appear that provincial policy, especially in the west, has favoured the recreational fishery over the commercial fishery because of the generally accepted notion that recreational fishing generates more net economic benefits to communities. In some areas, for example, commercial fishermen are restricted to harvesting fish, such as whitefish, that do not qualify as game fish. Game fish, such as pike, pickerel and sauger, on the other hand, usually command higher market prices. The report noted that:

While the allocation of stock does not fall within its mandate, the Committee . . . [stresses] that the dwindling access by commercial fishermen to the higher value game species has decreased their ability to make a living from their trade . . . (p.27)

Future stock allocation decisions should, therefore, take into consideration all relevant information, including the economic hardship of commercial fishermen. Stock enhancement programs are needed to increase the quantities of high value species and the allocation of some species for commercial fisheries. In Ontario, the Department of Natural Resources should create a ministerial advisory committee which could, among other things, help foster better understanding between recreational and commercial fishermen. In the west, a permanent inter-provincial freshwater fishery committee should be created to co-ordinate policies and share information on matters of provincial jurisdiction.

I come now to the problem of rough fish. There is the whole question of rough fish and whether enough effort has been put out in seeking markets for these varieties. Underutilized and unsaleable species of fish, such as carp, mullet and ling cod, are difficult to market because of their characteristics and consumer misconceptions. Surimi, the raw fish paste used to make simulated crab and other seafood analogs, is a possible long term solution to the rough fish problem. But as long as surimi producers can obtain cheaper fish, such as Alaskan pollock, there will be resistance to using freshwater species.

The report calls for more research and development work to find alternative uses for freshwater rough fish species. As well, the responsibility of granting licences for the purchasing, processing and marketing of these species in the west should be given to an impartial body composed of federal and provincial officials, as well as FFMC representatives. The net result of this should be an overall increase of freshwater fish sales.

Honourable senators, you will be happy to know that I am coming to the end. One good fish story generally begs another; indeed, this report identifies a number of issues which need further study and evaluation. First, an in-depth economic comparison of the single-desk selling and free enterprise systems needs to be undertaken. Without such a study, comparisons between elements of regional fisheries are difficult at best because of the wide variety of species and the diversity of equipment and techniques used by the large number of fishermen involved.

Second, surprisingly little is known about market demand in Canada—its size, nature, price sensitivity and potential.

Third, the market viability of local processing in the western region needs to be investigated.

Fourth, we have to wrestle with the problems of over-participation and over-capitalization in both the western and Ontario regions. Too many fishermen, it seems, are chasing too few fish. Even with the harvestable quantities of fish, efforts need to be made to balance capital investments and the number of people employed in the fisheries.

Fifth, there is the need for continued evaluation and monitoring of large industrial projects, such as the Churchill River and Garrison water diversion projects, which can seriously threaten the freshwater fisheries.

Finally, there should be a careful monitoring of developments in aquaculture with a view to assisting the consolidation of the freshwater aquaculture industry in Canada.

These are but some of the issues that require further investigation. In short, a number of changes in the marketing structure, the strategy, and the resource management system are proposed to ensure a permanently prosperous freshwater fishing industry in Canada. We found that little was known about many factors of the freshwater fishing industry. I understand that the Canadian Wildlife Association, which appeared before our committee, has also put out a report which agrees with some of the recommendations in our report and some of the problems we encountered. As we continue our report on the west coast fishery and the east coast fishery, we hope to learn about the problems they face and to come up with definitive recommendations in our overall report on the marketing of fish in Canada.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc, pursuant to notice of October 9, 1986, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills and other matters as are referred to it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the comments I made about the motions of Senators Hastings and Sinclair also apply in this case. I think it would be for a few months only. In any event, it seems we will have a chance of closing the barn door after the horses have gone.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

POVERTY LINE REVISIONS: BASED ON CALCULATIONS WHICH INCLUDE ADJUSTMENTS FOR DISPOSABLE PERSONAL INCOME, FAMILY SIZE AND CHANGES IN THE NUMBERS OF FAMILY UNITS OF VARIOUS SIZES IN CANADA EACH YEAR

7	31,100	32,700	$21,415 to $27,606

* Base year 1978 — amounts vary with degree of urbanization.

The Senate Committee poverty lines are based on a formula which is updated annually on the basis of a measure of disposable personal income in Canada and changes in the distribution of families of various sizes.

THE SENATE POVERTY LEVEL is approximately 50% of average Canadian family income adjusted to family size, making provision for inflation and gross national product. For families of sizes 2, 3 and 4, the Poverty Lines are almost exactly half of the average income for families of those sizes.

STATISTICS CANADA: Poverty Level Lines are based on changing consumption patterns which now indicate that families who spend 62% or more of their income on food, clothing and shelter (as opposed to the 70% criterion used at an earlier date) are in straitened circumstances. These limits are also differentiated by size of area of residence.

1985 Family Size	Percent and Number Below Senate Committee Poverty Lines 1985	Percent and Number Below Statistics Canada Low-Income Cut-Offs for 1985 *
Unattached Individuals	35.9%  (985,000 persons)	36.6% (1,003,000 persons)
Family Units of two or more persons	21.1%  (1,444,000 families)	13.1% (901,000 families)
Total Number and Percentage of Persons Below Poverty Line	22.8%  (5,783,000 persons)	15.9% (3,900,000 persons)

 Senate poverty lines include more families

 Senate and Statistics Canada almost similar

Unattached Individuals	37.8% (1,025,000 persons)	38.4% (1,040,000 persons)
Family Units of two or more persons	22.3% (1,501,000 families)	15% (1,007,000 families)
Total Number and Percentage of Persons Below Poverty Line	23.9% (6,024,000 persons)	17.8% (4,300,000 persons)

Statistics Canada figures for 1985 show that the lowest 20% of families and unattached individuals (lowest income quintile) received only 4.7% of total income. In contrast, the highest 20% of families and unattached individuals received 43.0% of total income. In contrast to recent years, however, these figures represent a very slight narrowing of the disparity between the lowest and highest group compared to 1984.

CANADIAN STATISTICAL REVIEW, JUNE 1984 — The Senate Committee Poverty lines (Senate). The Special Senate Committee on Poverty, chaired by Senator David A. Croll, developed poverty lines based on income levels which reflected "items of basic need". These lines are differentiated by family size and adjusted each year by an escalator based on living standards as reflected by the amount of disposable personal income available in Canada in any given year. The annual escalator is designed to adjust for real as well as nominal changes in income and for change in average family size over time. The resulting poverty levels are close to half of the average income for families for sizes 2, 3 and 4 in 1981. Senator Croll releases periodically an update of the Senate Committee poverty lines and those released for 1981 were used in this note.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH SYRIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the Government to bring us up to date on the position of the Government of Canada with respect to Canadian relations with Syria.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not know that I have very much to report beyond what the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for External Affairs has already told Parliament and the country. We have recalled the Canadian ambassador from Damascus for consultations. We are consulting with our western partners with a view to taking concerted action that would persuade the Government of Syria to renounce and abandon state terrorism.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I know that the Government of Canada has recalled our ambassador from Damascus and I know that the Prime Minister, when asked about this, stated that the Canadian government was examining the evidence which had been brought forward to link Syria with terrorism, evidence which caused the British government to break diplomatic relations with Syria. The Prime Minister said that the Government of Canada would be examining the evidence. He went on to say that any state that sponsors terrorism should be treated as a pariah and would not deserve to have relations maintained with other countries.

My questions are really as follows: Has the Government of Canada concluded that Syria itself is a source of terrorism, and, if so, will it follow through and break off diplomatic relations with Syria, as has been done by the Government of the United Kingdom? Presumably consideration is being given at the present time to those questions.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs is that certain elements of the Syrian government have been directly involved in terrorist activities. I am informed that the minister has seen sufficient of the British evidence to be satisfied that there is proof that the Syrians are involved.

Senator MacEachen: Therefore, one would expect that the Prime Minister, having concluded that any government linked to terrorism should be regarded as a pariah, is considering or will be proposing breaking off diplomatic relations with the Syrian government. Is that under consideration?

Senator Murray: As the Leader of the Opposition has noted, the British have severed diplomatic relations with Syria. They have not asked us or any of their other allies, so far as I am aware, to do that. Our position is that we believe that concerted action should be taken by the western countries with a view to persuading Syria to renounce and abandon terrorism and, in particular, to see that certain individuals and groups who are involved in terrorism should leave that country.

Senator MacEachen: I gather from what the Leader of the Government has said that even though Canada has concluded that Syria is the source of that terrorism, or that certain elements of Syria's government, as stated by the Secretary of State, display terroristic impulses; and even though the government has concluded that, and the Prime Minister has stated that any government that is terrorist should be regarded as a pariah, the government is not willing to follow through unless it gets help from other countries—that it will not take the stand that the United Kingdom has taken and sever diplomatic relations. It will say, "Well, we will not do anything further, even though we believe that Syria is a pariah."

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we have not excluded the possibility of severing diplomatic relations with Syria, but our position is that the best action is a concerted action with other countries. The British broke relations with Syria because the attempted bombing took place on their soil. They have not asked us or other countries to follow suit.

Senator MacEachen: They certainly asked their partners in the EEC. Sir Geoffrey Howe went there and failed to get any action from the EEC except a statement expressing a common sense of outrage. Apart from that, he went away empty-handed. So there is no comfort in that source.

I am puzzled that the foreign policy of the Canadian government is not a clear-cut one; that even though the Prime Minister has stated that Syria is a pariah, we would not do anything unless we were asked by the British or, indeed, unless we could join a group of other countries. I find that rather inconsistent with the very strong comment of the Prime Minister.

I might as well quote the Prime Minister. According to the media tape on the Prime Minister's interview with the MacNeil, Lehrer Newshour, when asked, "What do you think should be done about Syria?" he said:

Well I would want to examine more closely the evidence that is going between London and allied capitals.

We have been told now that the evidence has been examined and that the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that elements of the Government of Syria are involved in terrorism. The Prime Minister goes on to say:

But I think that any state that sponsors terrorism should be treated as a pariah. That's exactly what it is.

Why does Canada have any kind of diplomatic relations with a country that the Prime Minister has described as a "pariah"?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, let me repeat: My information is that the United Kingdom did not ask its European partners to sever diplomatic relations with Syria. The British Foreign Secretary was disappointed, as was the Canadian government, with the outcome of the meeting of the foreign ministers of the European Economic Community. I understand that a further meeting of community foreign ministers is to be held in London on November 10. Meanwhile, the Government of Canada has called in the ambassadors from the EEC countries to urge upon them a concerted action designed to get Syria to change its ways.

Senator MacEachen: What is the concerted action that Canada is recommending?

Senator Murray: My honourable friend will know that in due course. There are various sanctions and other diplomatic weapons that can be brought into play in a situation of this kind. However, the Leader of the Opposition will have to be patient for a few days yet.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has said that the Canadian government, through its ambassadors, is urging concerted action, but he refuses to tell us what that action is. I suggest that he refuses to tell us because the government is not recommending any concerted action that is meaningful. The Leader of the Government has mentioned sanctions. Is Canada now asking the EEC countries to impose sanctions on Syria? I would like to know.

Senator Murray: What I said is that there are various sanctions that can be brought into play in a situation such as this. The Government of Canada has called in the ambassadors of the EEC countries to urge upon them that concerted action be taken by them and other western partners in this situation. I may say that representatives of the United States State Department are expected here on the weekend for further discussions with Canada on this matter.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, it would be useful for us to know what Canada is advocating. It is asking for concerted action, including various kinds of sanctions. May we find out why we are calling in the Americans and the Europeans and urging something that is concealed from the Parliament of Canada?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I agree that it would be useful for Parliament to know, and Parliament shall know in due course.

Senator Frith: Some courses are "duer" than others.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—STATUS

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In light of Minister Carney's statement that the current trade talks with the United States would be imperilled if the United States government or Congress imposed tariffs against Canadian lumber, and in view of the fact that the United States government and Congress have chosen to ignore this threat and, indeed, impose such punitive tariffs, are the current trade talks now imperilled or in a state of peril?

than to damage the relationship between our two countries. So far as the recent actions taken by the United States are concerned, we will have an appropriate response to them.

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: In light of these new events and in light of the apparent change in strategy by Minister Carney to take a much more aggressive approach on the legal and negotiating side with the Government of the United States and with Congress, perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate could advise whether or not the Prime Minister's Office has prepared a secret plan defining key conditions that would trigger a full or partial withdrawal from the trade talks dealing with the government's search for a comprehensive free trade agreement.

Senator Olson: A hidden agenda, perhaps!

Senator Grafstein: In light of the fact that the fast-track negotiations will apparently be terminated in five months, has the Government of Canada set for itself minimum terms and conditions for any sort of agreement arising from the fact that it is now obvious that the government will not be able to obtain any type of comprehensive trade agreement with the United States?

Senator Murray: That is a very hypothetical question based on a hypothesis as to what we might or might not accomplish in the course of these talks. Several weeks ago I said in this place that, in the course of these negotiations, it is still our intention to work for the biggest, best and most comprehensive trade agreement we can get with the United States.

UNITED STATES TARIFF ON CANADIAN SOFTWOOD LUMBER—GOVERNMENT POLICY RE GATT DECISION

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: The Minister for International Trade has chosen to press Canada's case before GATT. Has the Government of Canada determined a strategy whereby this house would be informed as to what would happen in the event that the GATT determination is made in favour of Canada, and the American government and Congress choose to ignore any such decision?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): That, again, is a hypothetical question. I may say that the initiatives of the government, in responding to the United States action, are not limited to invoking the dispute settlement mechanisms of GATT. We are also proceeding quite aggressively in bilateral fora with the United States. I understand that a diplomatic note is being sent to the United States, and the minister herself may demand a meeting with Secretary of Commerce Malcolm Baldrige to discuss the matter.

UNITED STATES TAX ON IMPORTED CRUDE OIL—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. It is not a hypothetical question, because the United States has already stated that it intends to impose a surtax, or whatever the proper terminology is, on all crude oil in order to pay for an environmental program. However, the catch is that the tax on imported crude oil will be substantially more than on domestic. Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate can tell us what the government intends to do about that matter, since Canada exports quite a lot of oil to the United States. I have heard that the minister intends to take some action, but so that I may not be accused of asking a hypothetical question, I will put the question simply and directly: What does the Government of Canada intend to do about this matter?

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to three questions this afternoon. Once again, if any senator wishes, I will read the answers, otherwise I will ask that they be taken as read.

IMMIGRATION

REFUGEE STATUS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 2, 1986 by the Honourable Senator Haidasz regarding Immigration—Refugee Status—Government Policy.

Government policy concerning refugees abroad is directed primarily at providing resettlement in Canada, from countries of first asylum, to refugees who are in need of resettlement for protection purposes. All applying must meet the criteria for being considered as refugees as laid down in the Immigration Act and be either Convention refugees or in a designated class. The refugee definition used is almost identical to the United Nations High Commissioner's definition. In addition, all applicants must demonstrate that they are capable of successful establishment in Canada, taking into consideration assistance available to them, and they must meet other statutory requirements.

In the specific cases referred to, if the persons involved had arrived in West Germany, their assumed destination, or any other Western European country and had been granted asylum and permanent residence, there would probably not have been a need for their resettlement in Canada although any one of them could apply for admission.

In regard to the news reports that there are busloads of Iranian refugees moving toward Western Europe, the government was fully aware of the news media coverage of this mass movement of people. Officials in the Department of External Affairs were asked to fully investigate these reports and they found that there was no substance to the story.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER—CANADIAN EXPORT TAX

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 8 last by the Honourable Senator Austin respecting Canada-United States Relations—Softwood Lumber—Canadian Export Tax.

While there has been no formal request, some provinces have indicated that they would be opposed to the imposition of an export tax. In any event, this is not an issue, since the Government with the full support of the provinces is fighting to overturn the preliminary decision made by the Commerce department on October 16.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

ALLEGED MISUSE OF MANITOBA INDIAN BAND FUNDS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 8 last by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn respecting Indian Affairs and Northern Development—Alleged Misuse of Manitoba Indian Band Funds. This is a rather lengthy answer and I ask that it also be taken as read. Perhaps the report attached to that answer could be tabled.

The former Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Honourable David Crombie, engaged in April 1986 the services of Ward Mallette, a chartered accounting firm to investigate allegations made by a number of Indian bands in Manitoba. Mr. Jim Curry, of Ward Mallette, submitted his findings to the department on June 9, 1986. These findings were distributed to the First Nations Confederacy and the Brotherhood of Indian Nations in Winnipeg on June 10, 1986.

The department completed a comprehensive review of the Ward Mallette Report and on August 20, 1986, made public the Departmental Response (attached is a copy of this report as information). Subsequent meetings were held involving the present Minister and departmental senior officials with the Indian leaders of a number of Manitoba bands during the months of September and October at which time discussions took place relative to the Ward Mallette report.

Following the resignation of Mr. MacPhee from the department's Manitoba Regional Office, the Minister requested the R.C.M.P. to investigate the allegations of wrongdoing referred to by Mr. MacPhee.

Also, the Minister asked the President of the Treasury Board to undertake a comprehensive review of the financial operations of the department's regional office in Manitoba.

Furthermore, the Minister has stated that any information regarding allegations currently being made by Mr. MacPhee regarding financial wrongdoings should be brought forward so it can be reviewed.

The Minister made a commitment to the chiefs of southern Manitoba that departmental officials were prepared to meet with bands on a case by case basis if necessary, to discuss individual band indebtedness problems.

In order to improve communications, the Minister has also agreed to meet with chiefs on a periodic basis to discuss their concerns face to face in a business-like way. He recently signed a memorandum of understanding with 40 bands in northern Manitoba establishing such a process.

DELAY IN PROCLAMATION OF ACT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, under the rubric of Delayed Answers to Oral Questions, an answer to a question I had asked on October 9 appears at page 81 of Senate Debates of October 28, 1986. The question I had asked on October 9 dealt with the proclamation of Bill C-45. The answer given yesterday states:

The proclamation of Bill C-45 is awaiting

So, it is true that it has not been proclaimed.

the approval of the House of Commons Board of Internal Economy. The Board met for the first time with the new Speaker to consider this and other matters on October 15. The bill will be proclaimed as soon as the appropriate consultations have been undertaken.

The phrase "appropriate consultations" is somewhat ambiguous. Does that mean that the consultations that the government considers appropriate are those to be undertaken with the House of Commons Board of Internal Economy, or can we assume that the government will be consulting the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration as well, since we are directly involved in the consequences of Bill C-45?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I chatted briefly with Senator Frith on this matter yesterday when I saw the content of the answer. I suggested to him then that it might be appropriate if the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration were to contact the minister and ask that a similar consultation process take place with that body.

I think it would be appropriate to have this matter dealt with at tomorrow's meeting of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration and, if it is agreed by the Senate, a message be sent to the minister asking him that the same courtesy be extended to the Senate as is being extended to the committee in the other place.

Senator Frith: Thank you.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips, for the second reading of the Bill S-2, An Act to implement conventions between Canada and the Kingdom of the Netherlands and Canada and Japan and agreements between Canada and the People's Republic of China and Canada and the Republic of Malta for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.—(Honourable Senator Hicks).

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, first of all, I commend Senator Doody for his handling of the motion for second reading of this bill. I commend him even though, I regret to say, I was not in the chamber when he made his speech. I have, however, read his speech and have familiarized myself with the documents that are attached to and in support of Bill S-2.

This is a bill which continues the series of arrangements that Canada has been making, chiefly in the past decade—but some of them extend back before that—to simplify the tax relations with and to avoid double taxation by various countries which are parties to the several treaties that we have made.

I first participated in a debate on those taxation treaties in 1980. At that time Canada had ratified 16 such treaties, and actually signed 20; four of them were pending ratification. The number we have now ratified is up to 41, and there are four others signed and awaiting ratification, and when these four that are before us now are completed, it will bring the grand total to 49 countries with which Canada has regularized and simplified its taxation arrangements with the advantage to its citizens and to the citizens of the other countries of avoiding double taxation, or strictly limiting double taxation in a consistent manner.

The present conventions are with the Netherlands and Japan. We first had a convention with the Netherlands going back as far as 1957, and there have been two supplementary protocols changing that original convention. That convention is now replaced by the provisions of Bill S-2.

By the same token, we first had a convention with Japan in 1964, ratified in 1965, and this bill replaces that convention.

The agreements with China and Malta constitute new treaties with two countries with whom Canada has not had tax treaties heretofore. So, these four constitute the countries that we are concerned with now.

There are no new or unusual features in this bill, or in the treaties attached to this bill, and I do not think that it is necessary for me to repeat the explanations which Senator Doody so completely and succinctly stated in this house yesterday. I should refer to one aspect, however, because I was greatly interested in it five or six years ago, and that was the provision that existed at that time with a number of countries whereby teachers could move to Canada—and could move in the opposite direction as well—and would pay no income tax in Canada for the first two years they taught here. This was made use of, particularly by a good many of our American teachers in Canada's universities, and resulted in a very inequitable situation in relation to Canadian academics. For example, as I explained to this house some years ago, if a university administrator had $20,000 to pay to a professor and he paid it to a Canadian professor, that Canadian professor would have to pay tax on the $20,000, but if he brought in an American for two years, or someone from the United Kingdom, or from Japan, or from the Netherlands—to come down to the present situation—he could pay the $20,000 and there would be no tax paid at all. Naturally, university administrators were fairly quick to notice this and, as I say, it redounded to the disadvantage of Canadian academics, particularly in relationship to the United States. Those exemptions were removed some time ago in relation to the United States and to most other countries, and this bill, or the protocols attached to it, which will be implemented by the passing of this bill, remove similar arrangements that presently exist and which enable teachers from the Netherlands and Japan to have a tax advantage by coming to teach in Canada for a two-year period; nor will Canadians have a tax advantage by going to teach in the Netherlands, or in Japan, for a two-year period.

I do not think it is necessary for me to comment much more on this legislation. This will mean that we will have workable and sensible tax arrangements with 49 countries when the provisions of these treaties are ratified. However, I would like to say this: The working out of these agreements, or conventions, with a number of countries all over the world is an illustration of the work that goes on by those whom we sometimes disparagingly refer to as "bureaucrats" in the departments of government who have worked faithfully and persistently over a number of years to improve arrangements to the benefit of Canadian citizens and the citizens of the other countries concerned. I would like to commend those persons whose names never get in the newspapers and whose actions seldom arouse very much publicity, either commendatory or hostile, for the steady, solid work that they have been doing, chiefly in the Department of Finance and in the Department of External Affairs.

Senator Doody commended the bill to members of this house and said that, if senators wanted, it could be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Personally, I do not see any reason why it need be referred to that committee. As I have said, there are no new features in this legislation. The Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has considered several similar agreements in years previous. So, I would be willing to give my consent to and support of this legislation without its being referred to a committee.

However, if there are other senators, particularly some of the newer senators here, who feel that they have something to gain or to learn by having the bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, I leave that decision to my honourable friend, the mover of the motion for second reading.

I propose to support the bill and urge my colleagues to do the same.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I certainly accept Senator Doody's and Senator Hicks' assurances that this bill is to be supported for the reasons outlined eloquently by those two gentlemen, but the suggestion that it not be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, even for a one-session study, is, if I listened carefully, based on the fact that it resembles or is the same as many of its predecessors dealing with tax relations between other countries and Canada.

It is my suggestion that, just to be sure that is so, someone from the department should appear before the Senate committee to assure the committee that this bill is the same as previous bills on the subject. Since similar bills were referred to that committee, I believe this bill should be referred to committee for that assurance, and then the committee can report in due course.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Doody speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I wonder if there is any way of changing that format. It sounds like the grim finality of an Air Canada pilot telling us that this is our final approach. I keep hoping there will be another approach some day, somewhere. Perhaps this will have the effect of closing the debate.

In any event, honourable senators, I have very little to add to the remarks of Senator Hicks. I thank him for his comments.

I do note that it is desired by those in the department that we move the bill along as quickly as we can, and I know that we will do so. I understand that at least one of the countries with whom agreement is being reached is anxious to have it implemented as quickly as possible, and to that end I am sure the bill will receive expeditious treatment.

I have absolutely no objection to referring the bill to committee, since I think there is merit in that suggestion. I know that Senator Sinclair is anxious to get as much practice and as much action in his new role as he can, and I have no intention of depriving him of any opportunity to get into full swing.

I thank Senator Hicks particularly for his comments about the teachers' exemption. I passed over that rather lightly yesterday. It is a matter of some significance and, naturally, with his background and talent in that particular area, it was only proper that he should bring it to our attention.

Therefore, honourable senators, with these few words, I commend second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

CANADA PETROLEUM RESOURCES BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes moved the second reading of Bill C-5, to regulate interests in petroleum in relation to frontier lands, to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and to repeal the Canada Oil and Gas Act.

He said: On this very gloomy and cloudy afternoon, I am here to bring honourable senators a ray of sunshine.

Senator Perrault: The sunshine boy!

Senator Barootes: It gives me great pleasure to move in the Senate second reading of Bill C-5, the Canada Petroleum Resources Bill.

This bill, honourable senators, represents a fundamental break with the philosophy of the previous administration's National Energy Program. It replaces a discriminatory and discretionary regime with a straightforward and fair set of rules to guide petroleum exploration and development in Canada's frontier lands. While the immediate prospects for a frontier oil and gas exploration and development program have been seriously impaired by current world oil prices, this bill will be welcomed by the industry, the "offshore" provinces and the Territories. It will set in place a regime that will not only recognize the rights of resource owners and resource developers but will also ensure that, where frontier opportunities exist, they may be pursued without impediment from any quarter.

Honourable senators, world oil prices will ultimately and inevitably rise. In looking to the future, this period of low prices offers us a window of opportunity to establish a frontier energy strategy which is fair rather than discriminatory—one which is responsive to markets rather than to artificial stimulation by government incentives. Such incentives can not only be costly to the public purse but by the ebb and tide and the rise and fall of world oil prices, and, indeed, of government largess, may bring about an instability both to frontier exploration and development and to the social fabric of those regions.

I should like to provide honourable senators with a little history. Since being elected just two years ago, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney's government has consulted extensively with representatives of the industry, the Territories and the provincial governments. As a result of these consultations, there have been some significant achievements. There are now joint management regimes with the provinces of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. I have no doubt that there will be further accords with the north and the west as well, in the future. Furthermore, the Western Accord, the signing of the natural gas markets and pricing agreements and the end of the petroleum and gas revenue tax have signalled to the industry that Canada is once again depending on the industry's entrepreneurial spirit to find and develop our resources in oil and gas. The basis now is to reward success rather than to reward activity.

Let us look at the present. All honourable senators recognize that oil and gas exploration in the north and in the offshore carries a very high cost and high risk. In response to this condition, Bill C-5 sets out a simple and fair set of rules to promote the development of our frontier petroleum resources. This legislation, for example, will repeal and replace the Canada Oil and Gas Act with a law that emphasizes the rights and obligations of the people of Canada as the resource owners and the industry as the resource developer.

No longer will the responsible federal minister hold broad discretionary powers to choose, for example, who may hold exploration rights. From now on there will be a competitive bidding system for exploration rights, one based on a single bidding criterion—the best bid wins. The administration of oil and gas rights is now set out in clear, precise terms. Furthermore, there are more specific appeal procedures to balance any limited discretionary powers of the ministers involved and their departments.

Honourable senators will also notice in this bill a much reduced role for the state in the oil and gas business. Specifically, the crown share arrangement, which gave governments the right to expropriate commercial petroleum reserves, has been eliminated. The preferential treatment accorded Petro-Canada has also been eliminated. However, this bill preserves the right of the Canadian government to require a 50 per cent Canadian ownership of frontier prospects at the development or production stage in a fair manner.

This bill also confirms native rights claims. It does not prevent in any way the settlement of land claims with the different native groups in Canada.

Honourable senators, as I have said, the development of our frontier resources will be a costly and risky venture. By allowing the adoption of a new profit-sensitive royalty structure, Bill C-5 will ensure that industry has appropriate incentives to take on this work.

The new royalty regime will ensure an equitable distribution of revenues between the resource owners and the resource developers. It will permit industry to earn a fair rate of return on its investment in the frontier before governments, as owners, receive justifiably higher rates of royalty. This profit-based approach, which does away with the discriminatory practices of the past, has been broadly supported in the industry and will help to create the necessary incentives for a rise in activity.

Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources has received and is receiving representations from the major interests affected by this bill. Concerned governments, aboriginal peoples' organizations, associations representing offshore-related interests and most of the major industry players in the frontier will make known their views to this chamber through our Energy Committee. We shall continue to listen to and respond to their concerns in the spirit of consultation that characterizes this bill.

Let us look for a moment at the future. Honourable senators, frontier activity will return to its past levels because the frontier holds the petroleum reserves of our future. The government's job now is to put its house in order. This goal is being achieved with a bill which represents a new, cohesive frontier energy policy built on trust between governments and a respect for the initiatives of industry. Regional governments as well have been included in these considerations. These governments have justifiably demanded an equal say in oil and gas activities in their regions. Furthermore, the government of the Northwest Territories has indicated its interest in negotiating a northern accord as one step towards improving the economic climate in the north. In the meantime, a federal ministerial action force on Arctic initiatives has been established to consider measures which will alleviate the impact of the decline in exploration activities upon northern communities. The action force has already travelled to the north for first-hand consultations with the northern governments and residents on ways and means to more effectively support economic development in that region.

Honourable senators, the Canadian Petroleum Resources Act will be the cornerstone for the development of petroleum resources on Canada's frontier lands. Let me speak of its legislative framework. Bill C-5 is one of three principal parts of the legislative framework governing Canada's offshore areas of the Northwest and Yukon Territories. Bill C-5 puts in place a clear, less interventionist regime dealing with rights for exploration, for discoveries and for production.

The second part of this framework is the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act which deals principally with technical matters, mainly safety and the environment.

The third part of this framework concerns legislation to implement the accords. For example, Bill C-6, which will be coming forward soon, is meant to implement the accord between the Governments of Canada and Newfoundland and Labrador on offshore oil and gas resource management and revenue sharing.

The provisions of Bill C-5 in the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act are going to be included as our new basic framework.

For a summary of this bill, the new law will put in place three different rights: (a) The exploration licence; the right to explore for and the exclusive right to drill and test for petroleum for a period not exceeding nine years. To obtain that right, one must win on the basis of a single criterion, as I mentioned: a call for bids; (b) If one makes a discovery, there is the right to obtain a significant discovery licence. In the view of the industry, a significant discovery licence constitutes the most important part of that right; (c) A production licence, which gives the right to produce for a period of 25 years or for as long as production continues from that field or pool of petroleum.

It is important for us to realize that Bill C-5 increases the level of certainty, since discretionary powers of the minister are greatly reduced. It eliminates the crown share; it eliminates Petro-Canada's preferential treatment; it continues the Canadian ownership rate of 50 per cent before a production licence can be issued. However, some degree of flexibility of reaching that level of 50 per cent ownership is included.

The bill also ensures that the sale of shares in those companies to meet that minimum Canadian ownership rate will reflect fair market value to the seller—and that will be established by an independent evaluation.

Finally, it establishes a royalty system which is able to adapt as circumstances may require.

Honourable senators, I believe it is fitting that I try to give, in as succinct a manner as I can, the various clauses of a very long bill. I will give only an outline. Part I is a general part, and defines the designated authorities, the manner of giving notices, and provisions respecting interest in frontier areas.

Part II concerns the issuance of interests. It establishes provisions for issuing crown lands and benefit plans. It also establishes the rights issued on a competitive basis.

Part III concerns exploration, and it enunciates the provisions pertaining to exploration licences, significant discovery licences and drilling orders.

Part IV concerns production. It establishes the provisions pertaining to commercial discoveries, to development orders and production licences, which, as I mentioned, last for 25 years or longer.

Part V concerns Canadian ownership. It defines the required Canadian ownership rate for production licences, and there are provisions for achieving the required 50 per cent Canadian rate.

Part VI is an important part, having to do with royalties. It defines the provisions pertaining to the time and manner of payment, the reports and records, the assessments, the objections which may be brought by the companies, and an appeals method to the Federal Court if a dispute or discussion is not settled. The Governor General-in-Council has the final decision, unless it goes to the Federal Court.

Part VII concerns the Environmental Studies Research Fund, which applies to physical and social research. That has been retained from the Canada Oil and Gas Act, but has been renamed as a research fund. Members of the public have now been added to that board of expertise.

Part VIII refers to transfers, assignments and registration. It establishes the transfer of production licences that require approval and transfers of exploration rights that require disclosure.

Part IX concerns administration and enforcement. It defines the requirements of disclosure of information, its confidentiality, its circumstances, and which conditions might lead to the cancellation of rights of a company.

Part X concerns the transitional, consequential and commencement portion of the bill, outlining that the existing rights are to be carried forward into the Canada Petroleum Resources Act.

The government understands that the discriminatory laws and government subsidies can no longer secure energy self-sufficiency in themselves. We must be capable of looking beyond the industry's immediate difficulties and prepare it for a future of steady growth by instituting policies that encourage development rather than smother initiatives; policies that pursue the national interest rather than nationalization; policies that are based on principles of consultation and cooperation and which are shared by all Canadians.

Honourable senators, the Canada Petroleum Resources Bill meets those high standards and deserves the support of this chamber.

Honourable senators, that is the ray of sunshine that I thought you might enjoy today.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Hastings, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Paul David moved the second reading of Bill C-11, to amend the Income Tax Act.

He said: Honourable senators, in a press release dated September 25, the Minister of Finance, the Honourable Michael Wilson, and the Minister of State for Finance, the Honourable Tom Hockin, announced that they would be giving the highest priority during this new session to legislation to authorize the prepayment in November of the child tax credit for 1986.

This desire of the government is reflected in Bill C-11 which was granted passage by the House of Commons on October 17. I now have the pleasure and the honour to introduce this bill in the Senate.

Honourable senators, we hope that this bill will receive quick consideration and approval so that the cheques can be sent to the recipients by the date announced in the Budget Speech of February 26.

Bill C-11 contains only four clauses which amend the Income Tax Act to meet the objectives of the government regarding prepayment of the tax credit and to specify how the payments will be made.

Clause 1: Subsection 122.2 of the present legislation provides a tax credit for children who are under eighteen at the end of a taxation year. Those eligible were children for whom an individual was entitled to a family allowance in January of the following year.

The act will be amended to provide that individuals will be entitled to a tax credit for a child who would have been eligible if he had not died during the year.

This change applies to the 1986 taxation year and subsequent years.

Clause 2: Section 150 of the act is repealed and replaced by a new provision which states that individuals who have received a prepayment of the Child Tax Credit must file a return for the taxation year in which they receive this prepayment, even if they have no taxes to pay.

This amendment is a consequence of new subsection 164.1 of the act, that is clause 4 of the bill, and applies to the 1986 taxation year and subsequent years.

Clause 3: Subsections 160.1 and 160.2 of the act are amended for the 1986 taxation year and subsequent years to take into account the prepayment of the child tax credit.

Finally, clause 4: It is essential to add after section 164 of the act a new subsection 164.1 which will provide for prepayment of a portion of the Child Tax Credit for taxation years beginning in 1986.

If the family income has not exceeded $15,000 in 1985, the amount payable in November of this year will be $300 per child. This amount will be deducted from a maximum tax credit of $454 per child for the 1986 taxation year.

If the prepayment exceeds the credit to which the individual is entitled, the surplus will go toward reducing the tax reimbursement of the individual or increasing his taxes due, whichever the case may be.

Honourable senators, I shall summarize my comments on this bill under three headings, first, family benefits, second, the social commitment of this government, and third, the evolution of the Child Tax Credit program.

Family benefits—since the Child Tax Credit was introduced as family support in 1978 and 1979, the approved amount per child under 18 was payable once a year only, after the taxpayer had filed his return.

Bill C-11 has the great advantage of having the Child Tax Credit paid in two instalments, for the time being—$300 in the fall, which represents two-thirds of the maximum amount, and a second payment in the spring. You will no doubt agree that this prepayment is better suited to the needs of families, whose expenses increase in winter and decrease during the usually more favourable summer season.

As a consequence of this fall prepayment, the government is reducing the qualifying period and also hopes to reduce the number of families who unfortunately must resort to tax discounting services.

Many groups and individuals who appeared before the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology recommended such a change. The government responded to that sensible and very beneficial recommendation.

The prepayment will be made payable to the family allowance recipient, who in the great majority of cases is the mother of the child or children involved.

The provisions of Bill C-11 are in line with the objectives of the existing act, but they add to the security of the most needy families who will appreciate receiving two payments rather than a single one.

This government's social involvement—the tax credit has been increased by $70 between 1985 and 1986. The $454 maximum per child is an extra allowance to families with income below $23,500. Where the family income exceeds that amount, the tax credit is reduced by $5 for each $100 of extra income.

The November prepayment is made to families whose income was below $15,000 in 1985. Some would have preferred a higher ceiling. On the other hand, statisticians believe the suggested amount will have the great advantage of reducing the number of faulty payments. It must indeed be stressed that the cheques will be automatically sent to the previous year's claimants, those for the year 1985, as I said.

It is expected that some 725,000 families would receive a prepayment, for a total 1,300,000 children.

Since Bill C-11's main purpose is to help families that are the most in need, the government is proving in a concrete way its concern for helping those families as a priority, despite fiscal constraints.

The changing tax credit program—the income tax credit is in fact an extra family allowance for families in the lowest income group. As we have seen, the tax credit per child has been increased by $70 for 1986. With the $36 increase forecast for 1987 and a similar amount for 1988, the credit will reach $489 and then $524, a 36 per cent increase between 1985 and 1988.

Moreover, Bill C-11 contains a significant and innovative change. Until now, when a child who was eligible to a tax credit died, the taxpayer was not entitled to a tax credit for the year during which the death occurred. The new legislation will make it possible for a taxpayer to claim the tax credit beginning in tax year 1986. It is expected that some 3,000 families will benefit from this change which emphasizes the humane attitude of this government.

I know that not all family assistance programs will experience such a generous development. Yet, honourable senators, it seems to me that it is reasonable, fair and equitable to protect first and foremost families with the greatest needs.

It is interesting to note that the research team for our Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, chaired during the last session by Honourable Senator Arthur Tremblay, indicated, in a study published last September, that in 1988, the total expenditures resulting from the Child Tax Credit Program would amount to $1.865 billion. If I have properly interpreted the data provided, 90 per cent of this $1.865 billion is earmarked for families whose income is under $25,000. I suggest that such statistics confirm this government's concern for social justice.

Honourable senators, it is an honour for me to present to you Bill C-11, the main purpose of which is to improve the quality of life for families living under the poverty line. The government is anxious for the Senate to adopt this bill as soon as possible, because it is being introduced for purely humane reasons. I trust that you will support my view that the Senate should adopt urgently this legislation, so that the families concerned may get a cheque in November, as expected.

I thank you for your kind attention.

● (1450)

[English]

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, it is my privilege to respond, on behalf of this side of the chamber, to the presentation made so adequately by Senator David.

● (1500)

First of all, I want to congratulate him on giving a very broad outline of legislation which is basically good but which, as I will show as I move further into my response, does not really go as far as the mover feels it does. I suppose I could use the analogy that he, as a medical doctor, is treating his patient, but it is a fairly minimal treatment, and if he had really wanted to look at the details of the condition of his patient, he might have taken a much more adventurous course.

The government, in proposing to pay $300—which is two-thirds of the Child Tax Credit of $454—is limiting that automatic payment to those Canadians who had family incomes last year of $15,000 or less. That represents approximately 30 per cent of the recipients of the Child Tax Credit, according to evidence given by the minister, the Honourable Thomas Hockin, at a pre-study session before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Thirty per cent of those receiving this very welcome payment through the Child Tax Credit system will receive these needed funds. That means that the other 70 per cent must wait until well into next year, go through the process, very often, of using a tax rebate discounter, and experience the usual problems associated with delay.

The honourable senator has indicated that it is the wish of the government to provide social justice, and certainly this is a step in the right direction. However, I would like to point out to the government that, in proposing this bill, it has taken a minimal approach in order to ensure that it does not get into any trouble through this prepayment. I can understand their reluctance. In prepaying the Child Tax Credit through the method by which they are planning to do so involves a difficult kind of mechanics.

As I have said, the Honourable Thomas Hockin, Minister of State for Finance, appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and at that time I asked him the question:

Why did you pick $15,000, and why did you not pick a sliding scale? That would be fairer.

Mr. Hockin responded:

That is an important and valid point . . .

And I read that to let honourable senators know how important my questions are—

. . . and is something the government will monitor to see if changes can be made in future years.

I think, however, the important statement he made was this:

I can tell you why the $15,000 threshold is there. It was picked to minimize the number of incorrect prepayments.

As I say, in a way, you cannot blame the government. They have the immense responsibility of making these hundreds of thousands of prepayments, many of which may create problems, and I am sure that their bureaucrats have advised them to make the payment as low as possible so that the government does not run into any trouble.

However, as I pointed out to the minister, this decision has no relationship to the actual hardship that may be suffered by the family that is the recipient of the Child Tax Credit. It means simply that if you earn a gross income of $15,000 as a family, you receive the prepayment automatically. However, if you earn $15,200, you do not receive it. Therefore, a family with one child, earning $15,000, will get the $300 payment, which is a substantial prepayment. However, the family with $15,200 and—using an extreme case—say, with seven children will get nothing until, in the course of time, they get the refund, probably through a rebate discount procedure.

The latter family that I referred to is in much more difficult circumstances. The living conditions of a large family with an income of just slightly higher than the broad $15,000 landmark would have problems that were very much greater than those of the smaller family. Therefore, I point out to you that, although this bill does try to cover the whole spectrum, it really just touches the fringe of the problem.

That is not to say that we are not appreciative. When we were dealing with Bill C-83, the tax rebate discounting bill, it was pointed out by the government and by the opposition that it was very important that this prepayment be issued. The government responded as quickly as possible. However, those of us on this side of the house feel that there could have been a much better method of distributing the largess in advance; that the distribution should be more in accordance with need rather than being related to a low base maximum. The method that the government has chosen helps many, but it does not necessarily help the people most in need. I point that out to the government in the hope that, after reviewing the operation of the legislation, these levels will be raised and that, after this experience, much more adequate care will be taken in helping those who most need help.

If I were a member of the government, I would not be so very proud of the fact that you have achieved social justice by this particular bill. It does seem a logical step. I notice that the government is patting itself on the back by indicating that the payment goes up $70 this year, with a further increase next year, to a total of $524 in 1988. However, I would like to remind the government and the people who might think that this is a step in the right direction that it is also accompanied by a reduction in the maximum income, which used to be $28,500 and is now $25,000. I would also indicate to the government that there is a form of de-indexation going on which also has its effect on those who receive the payment. I would also remind the government of increases in sales tax, within the last two years, of 4 per cent, and such increases always have a very heavy effect on the lower-income families who do not benefit nearly as much as others from other forms of legislation. As all of us would agree, the sales tax is a tax on those with a lower income.

Therefore, when you look at the overall picture, I am not sure that families are going to be better off when you take into consideration the higher income tax rates, the de-indexation, the lower ceilings, the sales tax and all of the other burdens that are being placed on lower-income families. I will admit that there is some very slight compensation being made through the increases in the Child Tax Credit.

As the government pats itself on the back for this great piece of social legislation, perhaps it is appropriate for me to remind them that in 1978 this measure was introduced by the then Minister of Health and Welfare, the Honourable Monique Bégin. At that time it was a unique piece of legislation. It was a great shelter and a great safety net for those with low incomes. However, the legislation did not pass automatically. Our friends on the other side of the house did their very best to raise the normal objections that oppositions raise, but, nevertheless, it was a very important piece of legislation in providing the type of social justice that we have talked about today. I think that the Honourable Monique Bégin will go down in the history of this country as the one who introduced this form of payment to those with large families and low incomes. Therefore, all in all, I think we can all take credit for what is a very significant social program.

There will be some problems with prepayments and the so-called tax situation when incomes rise in 1986. I believe Senator Frith raised that point during the meeting of the committee. Those whose income totals $16,000 this year may receive this payment, although they are only supposed to have earned $15,000. That will create some bureaucratic problems. I think they will be worked out. But, as I say, the government has ensured that it has minimized benefits to eliminate as much as possible people receiving these payments who should not receive them.

All in all, we support the legislation, although we think it has not gone far enough. This is a logical follow-up to excellent legislation. I congratulate the government on at least taking this modest step in righting the inequities that were built in.

I conclude by saying that we are delighted to see tax discounters restricted somewhat. Although they may come up with all kinds of gimmicks to find out who is receiving the prepayments so that they can offer them money in July for the cheque which will be received in November, it will help to restrict them. What we really need—and I had hoped that this government had the ability and courage to do this, as I hoped the former Liberal government had—is to eliminate the right to discount altogether. That is the case in the United States. The United States does not allow tax discounters to take advantage of the poor, as they do in this particular case. We do not allow discounting of old age pensions, or other forms of discounting, yet this particular field seems to be open. American companies which cannot do so in the United States, and which control the tax discount business in Canada, are reaping millions of dollars as a result of the legislation.

I hope, now that we have already taken the first step and helped as much as we can those who need help, that the next step will be to, first, raise the limits and change the formula, and, second, to make it much more difficult for tax rebate discounters to take advantage of the poor and, if possible, to eliminate the discounters altogether.

Having said all that, honourable senators, I again congratulate the government on this step forward.

I have discussed with the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, the Honourable Senator Sinclair, the need to refer this bill to that committee, and he has indicated that, in his opinion, it is not necessary, since the committee has studied the subject matter of the bill. This bill is urgent in the sense that cheques should go out as quickly as possible. We would not want to delay the mailing of those cheques in any way. It is getting cold; families need winter clothing and winter boots. Christmas is coming, so I think it is important that the mechanism be set in place as soon as possible.

With that, honourable senators, we are quite prepared to accept second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator David, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Cogger, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, for an Address to Her Excellency the Governor General in reply to Her Speech at the opening of the Session.—(Honourable Senator Sinclair). (3rd day of resuming debate).

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, in accordance with our traditions, on October 1 we listened to the Speech from the Throne. It was a bit of a surprise to me and to other Canadians to hear a senior member of the government, the Honourable Marcel Masse, say that the Speech from the Throne should be done away with, that it is a waste of time, and that people pay no attention to it. I think that was a very unkind way to deal with the skillfully crafted language of our colleague, Senator Murray. He spent a great deal of time developing language and developing thoughts. As a new member of the cabinet, he should have expected better from his colleague.

Why do I say that the Speech from the Throne is not just an empty charade? I say that because it gives one an opportunity for review, and when making that review, one applies to it basic tests, and those tests are credibility and performance. The mover and seconder of the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne did attempt to meet those tests, as did the Leader of the Government in the Senate when he participated in the debate. They failed, and an objective analysis of what they had to say shows how they failed in that attempt, at least in the area of economic renewal, and it is to the area of economic renewal that I intend to address my remarks today. Other members on this side of the house will deal with other parts of the Speech from the Throne.

The Speech from the Throne stated:

—encouraging progress has been made towards renewing and strengthening the national economy.

Much has been made of the commitment of the government to economic renewal. The Leader of the Government in this house put it this way on October 7, at page 51 of Senate Debates. He said:

Thus, while our economic renewal is under way, and the evidence is there, in investment, job creation and interest rates, we recognize that Canada's economy needs a major impetus to new growth.

Honourable Senator Barootes, in dealing with this subject, delineated what he said are indisputable facts. At page 25 of Senate Debates of October 2, he said:

1. 600,000 new jobs have been created in less than two years. . . .
2. Unemployment, though still considerable and unacceptably high, particularly in some regions and in some economic sectors, has been reduced overall from 11.7 per cent in 1984 to 9.7 per cent in 1986. . . .

3. The prime lending rate has fallen from 13 per cent-plus to around 9.25 per cent, giving stimulus to the economy . . .

4. Inflation rates have not quite been "wrestled to the ground," to requote a phrase. They have, however, dropped from highs in the 12 per cent bracket to around 4 per cent . . .

Now, honourable senators, I have to say that Senator Barootes, when he attacked this problem in a statistical way, he did so as though he were performing an autopsy, with careless abandon of the facts. He should have approached it in a clinical way, in an in-depth way.

First, let us look at job creation. He said that 600,000 new jobs had been created in less than two years. The actual figure, according to Statistics Canada, is 563,000 jobs.

Senator Barootes: Oh, oh!

Senator Sinclair: He just bloated it up. But the important thing is that in the last two years of the former Liberal regime, Statistics Canada shows that there were 534,000 new jobs created. Now, if you reduce this to percentages, you will find that in each of the two-year periods—the two years under the Liberal regime and the two years that Senator Barootes had to deal with—the increase is about 5 per cent in both cases.

● (1520)

Now, honourable senators, it is easy to understand, I suppose, that Senator Barootes would be proud that the government of which he is a part equalled the Liberals in the two-year period. That is understandable—

Senator Frith: Justly proud.

Senator Sinclair: —but it is a far cry from "jobs, jobs, jobs."

Senator Buckwold: It is jabber, jabber, jabber, I think.

Senator Sinclair: Let's look at the lending rate. The prime has undoubtedly fallen, but we should not be looking at absolutes, we should be looking at the real interest rate and that, honourable senators, is troublesome. But even more troublesome, and even more alarming, is the fact that in the last two years we have seen the Canadian dollar, relative to the U.S. dollar, at an all-time historic low. We have seen real interest rates significantly higher than they should have been because of the necessity of maintaining support for the Canadian dollar in international markets. But even more troublesome than this, and one that surely, I would suggest, honourable senators, demonstrates that our economy is being badly mismanaged, is the fact that today we have a spread between our rates and the U.S. rates of 300 base points, instead of the normal 75 to 150. On these critical criteria, the so-called "economic renewal" is a dismal failure.

The third point Senator Barootes dealt with was inflation. Certainly, it is down somewhat, but here again you should look at the figures comparatively. That is the proper way to look at figures; you have to have some comparison. In the first seven months of this year, seasonally adjusted, the increase in the consumer price index in Canada averaged 4.1 per cent. In the United States, consumer price inflation in the same period averaged just 2.2 per cent. Inflation in Canada is about twice the U.S. level. Why is there this marked differential? Honourable senators, it is because of action—and because of inaction—taken by this government. First, inaction, such as failing to see that the fall in crude oil prices was reflected in the prices at the pumps in timely fashion; and, second, action, such as that being taken to increase markedly indirect taxes in both of the budgets that have been brought forth by this government.

The fourth point Senator Barootes said that we should look at was unemployment. "We are faced with a figure of a 9.7 per cent," he said. The comparative figure in the United States is somewhere a little under 6 per cent.

Senator Barootes: It is better than 22 per cent, though.

Senator Sinclair: I will answer your questions later. It is, indeed, difficult to accept the statement that there is room for satisfaction with that figure as it relates to where this economy is going.

Now, honourable senators, some of you may feel that it is wrong for me to use American comparisons in this statistical analysis that Senator Barootes sent me on. I would like to help you in that by recalling to you—some of you were here then—a quotation from the Debates of the Senate of December 8, 1983. The honourable senator speaking at that time was dealing with economic policy and characterized the economic performance of the then Liberal government as a debacle. This is what he said:

Our inflation today is 4.9 per cent. That is a tremendous improvement over what it was, so let us be grateful for it, but it is double the inflation in the United States—

The same situation as we have today. He states further:

... which competes with us for our domestic market and in whose market our exporters have to compete. ... Unemployment has been higher and is still higher in Canada, percentage-wise, than it is in the United States.

Again, we have a similar situation today. He went on again to say that:

... Canada is greatly affected by what goes on in the rest of the world. Let us not try to minimize that, because it is true, but how can we explain why we do so much worse and particularly worse than our neighbour, our principal economic partner, the United States? We must be doing something wrong ourselves;—

Now, honourable senators, those are quotations of the Honourable Senator Roblin. Using Senator Roblin's language and approach, the last two years have been an economic debacle.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, the agricultural industry in Canada is in deep trouble from coast to coast. There is fruit in the Okanagan, grain on the prairies, tobacco and grapes in Ontario, and potatoes in Atlantic Canada, all waiting to be sold in significant volumes and waiting to be sold at fire-sale prices. Without question, honourable senators, our farmers are in trouble. Our miners are in trouble in western Canada, in northern Ontario, and in Atlantic Canada. The oil and gas industry is a disaster, with rigs tied up in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and offshore, the Northwest Territories and in Atlantic Canada.

Now, honourable senators, we have already heard an awful lot—we have heard some more today—about what this government was and was not going to do for the oil and gas industry. May I give you another quotation? This is the quotation, and it states:

Today the city of Calgary is an economic basket case and the province of Alberta is probably in the worst economic condition of any of the provinces of this country.

That is the end of the quotation, which is found at page 28 of the Debates of the Senate of December 8, 1983, the speaker again being that outstanding senator, Duff Roblin.

That was a gross overstatement of the facts that existed in Calgary in December 1983, but what I was amazed at was the clarity of vision. In 1983 he was able to see Calgary as it is today. He has great foresight.

Now the chemical industry in Alberta, in Ontario and in Quebec is in bad shape. It maintains itself only in Quebec with the support of government, and it is on the verge of having government support it in the west. The forest products industry in the west, in Ontario, in Quebec and in the maritimes has to take down-time to maintain pressure to get prices at an economic level. So, honourable senators, where is all of this economic renewal? In fairness—and I am always trying to be fair—

Senator Barootes: Always.

Senator Sinclair:—I think you could quite properly point to the automobile industry in Ontario and in Quebec, and to some of the manufacturing industry. Some of the niches in the manufacturing industry are doing all right, but that is a far cry from what is needed to sustain a vibrant economy, and one that should provide opportunities to our people, and particularly to Canada's youth.

● (1530)

Honourable senators, we have another industry to which I should, perhaps, refer. I have always considered it as vital to the economic well-being of this country, and that is the transportation industry. Surely no one is going to say that it is in good shape. Tonnage is down; employment is down; purchases of railway equipment are down; and it is not in any renewal phase.

I will say just a few words, if I may, honourable senators, on rail passenger service. I recall what action was taken by this government in regard to that part of the transportation industry. Shortly after coming to power, this government reversed decisions taken by the former Liberal government and restored uneconomic passenger rail services in Atlantic Canada, Quebec, Ontario and in the west. As a result, honourable senators, the deficits from passenger travel in Canada are piling up at a significant rate.

Honourable senators, I think you must accept the fact that there is no opportunity in this country for long-distance, viable rail passenger travel or, indeed, rail passenger service outside of the Windsor-Quebec corridor. We have to face this fact. It has been true for some years. Surely this government should have the courage to face these facts and to accept them, recognizing that there are always some who would like to see a rail passenger service maintained, even though there is no effective demand, and I use "effective" demand in the economic sense. I would point out, honourable senators, that surely we do not need to spend, or even to consider spending hundreds of millions of dollars on new rail passenger equipment.

When I try to sum up the economic situation at this approximate midpoint of the present mandate of this government, I come to the conclusion that the recovery from the depth of the greatest recession since the '30s was demonstrably under way before the present government took office. The trend for a more upbeat economy was in place. During the election campaign, the government gave assurances to the Canadian public that this trend would accelerate so that we would have, under their direction, a buoyant and very strong economy. Those promises have not been fulfilled.

The economy is not back to the level it was at before the recession of the early 1980s, and, as I have drawn to your attention, what recovery there has been is very uneven, both in respect of individual industries and of geographic areas. Unquestionably, honourable senators, we have industries in Canada deep in recession and regions in dire straits.

It has been indicated, and I have made reference to this, that the decline in interest rates over the last couple of years, the decline in oil prices and a good stock market were economic pluses which indicated that the economy would accelerate across a broad front. Clearly, honourable senators, that has not occurred.

What has held back the acceleration is the very high level of real interest rates in Canada and the lack of a clear perspective as to what direction the government is attempting to take. The short-term outlook is certainly not encouraging. Our trading position is questionable. Indeed, we dipped into a negative position this summer. Apparently that was an aberration, but, nevertheless, aberrations are matters of concern.

Honourable senators, just recently the honourable the Minister of Finance indicated that he is going to move on tax reform. As I understand it from his statement, he is going to move by having a smaller proportion of tax revenues come from individuals and a higher proportion come from corporations. In other words, he is going to try to neutralize to change the focus.

If he succeeds in the short term, in economic terms, that will be negative. In the medium and long terms, it will be positive. However, as I said, in the short term, it is bound to have negative implications. I do hope he and his supporters have the necessary political will to make unpopular decisions. Based on what I think honourable senators have seen over the last couple of years, that support for the Minister of Finance has not been there.

Perhaps I might now summarize the short-term economic forecast. We will have relative slow growth which will continue. Consumer spending will slow down. Housing construction has peaked. Other construction is going to weaken. Business investment will continue sluggishly. The uncertainty of trade issues is a negative. Real interest rates are much too high. The Canadian dollar is under downward pressure, and we are going to have persistent high unemployment in the years just ahead.

What do we require? What is required for economic renewal is change—change from what we have had in the last two years, but change for change's sake is not enough; it has to be effective change and it must be appropriate. If it is effective and appropriate, honourable senators, we have the responsibility and the opportunity for dealing with it expeditiously in this chamber.

Given the economic climate we are in and that can be seen for the next couple of years, it is no wonder that the Leader of the Government in this chamber said—and I quoted him earlier—that we needed a major impetus to new growth. Where did he find those words? He found them in the free trade initiatives of the government.

Truly, honourable senators, this government has mishandled an opportunity of improving trade relations to the benefit of Canada. Canada lives on trade. That is a truism. The close proximity of the mass American market is an undoubted plus. Undoubtedly, the present U.S. administration has a favourable outlook towards enhanced trade.

Why do I say that the opportunity has been missed? Sufficient work was not done before the rhetoric was let loose. By "work" I mean a careful analysis of each and every major factor and danger point.

Clearly, protectionism in the United States was a problem. Clearly, the move to greater protectionism was under way in the United States. Certain expectations of advantages and expectations of success in negotiations should have been tempered. Any significant analysis would have proved these points and indicated, "proceed with caution."

What has happened? The rhetoric has taken us from "free trade" to "freer trade," to "enhanced trading environment" and now to "a comprehensive agreement—the best we can get." The spectrum shrinks as you go down the rhetoric.

Then came the announcement in Saskatoon. There that great quarterback, the Honourable Brian Mulroney, announced to all Canadians that he had given the trade initiative to a new player on his team. He said that the Honourable Pat Carney "had the ball and just watch her run with it."

First, honourable senators, the quarterback undoubtedly made a mistake in giving the ball to a linebacker, expecting her to perform like a running back. So what happened? In the midst of critical negotiations on softwood lumber, she dropped the ball and made an offer that destroyed her position. Surely, when our case is that there is no need for action from the Canadian side; that there is no need for action by the Americans; that the Canadian lumber situation is fair; that we have won the case in the past and that precedent is on our side; that there is no subsidization in Canada with regard to softwood lumber—surely under those circumstances, honourable senators, we cannot offer 10 per cent to the other side and expect that they will not consider that to be a concession and an admission of weakness.

However, honourable senators, I feel for the Honourable Pat Carney in making that decision, which was a bad one. She had good company, because the government of which she is a member had already backed off and given away two trump cards with regard to trade negotiations. The first of these was the legislative process of FIRA, and the second was the back-in provision of the National Energy Program. What did we get in return for giving up those two trump cards? Honourable senators, we got nothing.

Senator Murray: You would rather see those two provisions still in place, would you?

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, our economy is not working. Certainly there are abuses throughout the system that should be corrected. The corporate debt position of Canada is bad. The corporations have too much debt and that acts as a brake on economic renewal. Notwithstanding that, it is unfortunate to see that some people do not seem to recognize the need for attracting equity investment to the private sector. The need to stimulate equity investment in the private sector was recognized some years ago by the Honourable Jacques Parizeau with his introduction of the Quebec stock savings plan, which, after a slow start, has turned out to be a real success and one that was recently copied by other provinces.

In the federal realm, what did the government do? The Minister of Finance did make a significant step forward with his capital gains proposal, but what happened? It was criticized from what are, to me, surprising quarters.

Honourable senators, Canada has a debt problem not only in business but in government. That problem has to be addressed. Surely, however, taxation is not the only means by which to address it. Surely, honourable senators, the most effective way to reduce the deficit is through increasing the flow of revenue from productive work. This means that people who are not now productive have to have work and that people have to have confidence that they will get work. If action is taken to increase employment, to increase competence and to increase opportunities for productive work, revenues will flow and the deficit will be reduced.

At the same time, honourable senators, we cannot afford to waste money. We cannot do stupid things like piling up deficits or providing unnecessary services, such as rail passenger services, the need for which has not really been determined by effective economic demand. We have to stop wasting money by building things that are not required, or by building them at a higher expense just for purposes of location, and I refer to the remarks made by the Auditor General concerning the proposed penitentiary at Port-Cartier.

[Senator Sinclair.]

We, honourable senators, must support the proper actions taken by the Minister of Finance. We have to hope that, once he sets out on a proper course, he is not knocked off that course by his colleagues.

Honourable senators, we have had two bad years, but we can hope for the better. Hope is one of the things that will sustain us. The Speech from the Throne did not have a clear focus on what we could expect, so I conclude by saying that we are living in hope.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, in participating in the debate on the motion for an address in reply to Her Excellency's Speech from the Throne, it is a formidable task to follow someone with the experience and the background of Senator Sinclair, whose record over the past number of years in private industry and whose recent appointment as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce—on which I again congratulate him—balanced with his new-found sense of public responsibility, will, I am sure, make him go down in history as one of the greatest chairmen of that committee.

Honourable senators, there are few in this chamber who would not be interested in or whose lives would not be touched by the suggestion in the Throne Speech that there be established, as a matter of top priority, regional industrial expansion and development in Atlantic and western Canada. There are few, if any, in this chamber who have not had a personal or professional association—one which extends beyond the emotional—with this particular matter. I speak of everyone from premiers to ministers of the Crown, such as Senator De Bané, who actually headed the department of DREE in 1981 and 1982, to those of us like Senator Graham and myself, who did work in crown corporations that were set up in provinces to assist to this end.

Honourable senators, I wish that Senator Croll were in his seat today. He said yesterday that we have come a long way from the bad old days of the depression, but that we have a long, long way to go. He referred to his days as the mayor of Windsor in 1929, when he was responsible for setting up soup kitchens in that city. Well, colleagues, in 1929 my father was the member of Parliament for Cape Breton South. Several months ago I looked up two of the speeches that he had written in the late twenties and early thirties. I swear to you that, with few changes, I could make those speeches in this place today.

What we have seen, as Senator Croll pointed out yesterday, is a series of social programs which make up a safety net, if you will, which, while it has not changed the situation a great deal, has caused it to become more tolerable. But there has been a cost for that, and the cost has not been only financial. To a large degree, the cost has been expressed in a more social or sociological way. Poverty, to some degree, has been replaced by an absolutely shocking dependency which almost comes close, in some respects, to a form of slavery.

The former Prime Minister, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, said that the problem of regional development was as threatening to national unity as was the language issue. But regional disparity remains an unacceptable reality of Canadian life, and experience has shown us that spending more money, by itself, does not solve that problem. The Throne Speech noted that for many years successive governments have sought to provide measures intended to solve this problem in good faith, and that were, in some degree, partially successful. The efforts have not been effective. So, the Throne Speech reaffirmed the government's willingness to consider new approaches and to examine how our considerable moral support for Canada's regions can be promoted more effectively and efficiently, particularly with sensitivity to local conditions and opportunities.

The priorities were identified as Atlantic and Western; but today I wish to make a few remarks about the Atlantic region.

The Throne Speech said that the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency would be constituted in Moncton, and the briefing notes which accompanied the publication of the Throne Speech read in part—and I find this a little puzzling:

The function of this Board is to facilitate and to coordinate all federal development initiatives in the area. It will make full use of the expertise available in the Atlantic Region, and invite the maximum participation of other governments and organizations in the region.

Good words, but we must know exactly what they mean. I have no problem understanding the significance which the Prime Minister attaches to this priority, on which I congratulate him; and I can understand the frustration he expressed on Leaders' Day when he said that he had recently inquired about the Atlantic Enterprise Fund—which was put together only a few months ago—and was told that a small businessman in Atlantic Canada, who was seeking the kind of assistance that that fund was set up to provide, was told that he needed 14 signatures from 14 different levels of government before he could get the money to create a few jobs in Chatham, New Brunswick. I am left to wonder whether the fault is with politicians or with bureaucrats.

Over the past number of years we have gone from the advice given by the Atlantic Provinces Development Board to the advice given by the Atlantic Provinces' Advisory Council. They repeatedly called for a plan or a strategy for the development of the entire Atlantic Region—but we have never had one. The last study specifically concerned with promoting regional development was published in 1969. That was before the establishment of DREE, and DREE was disbanded in early 1982. We have never, ever, put our act together.

Strategies have been developed for certain sections of the provinces, fragmented, piecemeal. Earlier this year we were pleased when the government announced the "Atlantic Initiatives", consisting of the Atlantic Enterprise Program—the AEP—and the Atlantic Opportunities Program—the AOP. It appeared that a new approach had been launched, and we were supportive and very pleased, because the program addressed two of the key restraints on business in Atlantic Canada, namely, capital and markets. Initially, the program was to utilize the federal government's own purchasing power so as to provide regional development opportunities without expensive grants or hand-outs.

But here again there have been disappointments in only a number of months. The AEP appears to be tied up in red tape, and the AOP seems to have little political will to support it. We simply have to learn from the experiences of the past, the experiences of ADB, ADC, DREE, DRIE, AEP and AOP. If I did not use acronyms, honourable senators, we would be here until six o'clock.

I am impressed by the studies and the reports of the Atlantic Provinces' Economic Council over the past number of years, because one can see that at least theirs is now the clearest and most consistent voice in Atlantic Canada. Their studies found some progress in "catch-up" with incomes in other parts of Canada; but they have identified this increasing dependency of which I speak. The briefing note to which I referred suggested the maximum participation of other governments and organizations in the regions, but we have to ask ourselves: "Precisely what are they talking about?" Each provincial government has its own electorate to consider.

I am not urging political amalgamation of the maritime provinces, but I do recognize the implications of provinces going their own way in development. The political reality is that separate maritime governments want to please their own electorates—and they have to if they want to get elected. There is neither the motivation nor the pressure for the maritime provinces or the Atlantic provinces—occasionally I use the word "maritime" instead of "Atlantic" because I acknowledge that for many purposes Newfoundland regards itself as a separate region—but there is neither the motivation nor the pressure for the maritime or the Atlantic provinces to work together to the extent that the Atlantic Provinces' Economic Council rightly wants to see and which we desperately need.

We might ask ourselves: "How would they react if the federal government were to insist not upon maritime or Atlantic governments accepting a federally imposed plan but that the maritime and federal governments work out a plan jointly and then follow it?" This is going to require political courage from the federal government, courage to commit itself to a maritime or Atlantic strategy, which probably would risk offending some constituencies in the Atlantic region. But at least it would be a strategy in contrast to the piecemeal, sectional mishmash that we have had to date, which risks offending absolutely nobody and has not added up to much except the dollars we have spent.

However, I was absolutely delighted and heartened to read recently of the meeting that the Prime Minister convened with the premiers of the four Atlantic provinces in Charlottetown. It appears that there was clear enthusiasm for the concept, and the five gentlemen present agreed that they were going to take their time and were going to try to do it right.

I commend to honourable senators a recent book written by Professor Donald J. Savoie of the University of Moncton entitled Regional Economic Development—Canada's Search for Solutions. Professor Savoie is also Executive Director of the Canadian Institute for Research on Regional Development. Interestingly, it was only at noon today that I received this advisory that appeared on our desks. I did not know about it when I made my notes. It says:

The Prime Minister today announced the appointment of Mr. Donald Savoie to consult with the provincial governments, the private sector and other interested parties on the establishment of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. This the Premiers and the Prime Minister consider to be Phase I. The Prime Minister indicated that Mr. Savoie's appointment, which will be for six months, is a direct outcome of the meeting . . .

We want direct input from people in Atlantic Canada on the best way of proceeding with this initiative. Savoie's role is to help the government make the best use of the advice they receive.

Professor Savoie writes:

In Canada regional development and federal/provincial cooperation are ineluctably linked. Effective efforts at regional development are simply not possible without effective federal/provincial cooperation. A provincial minister recently put it this way: If the Feds are going to tell us where they're going to build a bridge, fine. We'll tell them afterwards where we're going to put the road. A study of Ottawa's Regional Development Program is thus largely an analysis of federal/provincial attempts to cooperate—something that everyone agrees is crucial to success. That said, few observers share the same view as to the most effective means to achieve such cooperation, and there have been a variety of approaches brought forward and tried. There is recognition, however, that the nature of Canadian federalism promotes regional conflicts over economic development and that a wide number of factors influence and shape federal/provincial cooperation in regional development. By and large these factors make federal/provincial cooperation in regional development more difficult rather than the reverse.

The Federal Government should approach federal/provincial negotiations with the purpose of putting in place measures to integrate regional economies. It should seek regional development efforts in a context considerably larger than individual provinces. In addition, the federal government should go to the negotiating table only after it has developed a clear set of objectives for national economic developments and a corresponding set for the regional level. Only then should a series of development strategies be formulated, and each strategy should entail an evaluation of top priority projects and the explicit trade-offs between regions.

I think the gentleman is referring to a matter which raised some eyebrows. That is, a development in one region might require a firm decision not to support similar initiatives in another region or references to counter-destructive interprovincial bidding for new plants.

We in the Atlantic area should look to this initiative, this new agency, with hope. We have the background and experience to know what the agency should not be. There seems to be a general agreement that we are not going to set up another level of bureaucracy between the region and Ottawa, that it will not be a committee of regional bureaucrats limited to repackaging current regional development programs that do not work. We have also received the assurance of the Prime Minister and the four Atlantic premiers that the agency will not be established quickly for the purposes of political or bureaucratic expediency without full regard to its role and its parameters.

We do know that a host of factors must be taken into consideration, that there must be political will to achieve real long-term change in the economic structure of Atlantic Canada. There must be explicit agreement between the federal government and the provincial governments to co-operate and minimize destructive rivalries. There is also a growing feeling that some mechanism must be found to allow this agency, or whatever it is to be called, to cross departmental lines to resolve problems. None of this is clear as yet. None of it will be easy.

Unrealistic goals create excessive expectations and ultimately lead to bitterness and disillusionment. Some areas may never receive an opportunity for full employment. It may be time for some experimentation. It may be time to develop something which heretofore may have been unheard of in Canadian public administration. To purists, sometimes unique proposals are organizationally untidy and, given the traditional incremental bias of bureaucratic officials, it could be viewed with great suspicion. There is evidence of that in the past, but we have to make a start. I pray that this new agency may now begin some master plan, obviously of a long term nature, to help solve a totally unacceptable problem.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, it is my great privilege to join in the debate on the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I would like to congratulate Senator Finlay MacDonald and all those who have preceded me in this debate on their fine contributions.

For my part, I want to speak about the energy crisis. It is the most important regional economic concern in the province that I represent, and should be a prime national and international concern. In this regard, I was pleased to hear Senator MacEachen's admonition to the effect that the government must rise to the challenge of bringing order to energy pricing in the international context. Senator Murray's only reference to the problem highlights that, with its various regional accords, this government has made activity in our oil and gas sector a function of world prices, and that when world prices increase, activity will increase and the energy producing regions will have more control and a greater share of returns.

The Speech from the Throne seems to me to go further than the Leader of the Government by saying that the government has taken "strong measures to support activity in a period of depressed world prices." It goes on to say that a primary objective of the government is to sustain Canada's energy prospects in cooperation with producing provinces, and that "these efforts are consistent with the true meaning and spirit of national unity."

In the abstract, the Throne Speech and Senator Murray's words to the effect that producing provinces will benefit as never before when higher prices return sound fine. The reality, however, is that to date the government policies dealing with the problems we now face on the oil and gas front, which are in sharp contrast to the energy environment at the time the policies were developed and implemented, are anything but fine. Moreover, the reaction to demands by the Province of Alberta and most sectors of the industry for policy changes to deal with the current crisis does not give rise to much hope that the government, having implemented an inadequate and overly simplistic energy policy, will now make the major revisions to its policy, which are so badly needed.

Our recent energy policy history is one of the Liberal's National Energy Program, developed at a time of price instability, starting out as a policy involving a high degree of government management of the energy sector, which tended, too slowly in my view, to a more non-interventionist policy. It has been replaced by a policy developed during a time of price stability, which involves almost no role for the federal government in directing the energy industry and which, if we are to serve the needs of the industry and thereby the country, must tend towards a more interventionist policy.

The facts are that the decline in the price of oil, which affects the price of competing fuels such as natural gas, has been and is the result of higher levels of non-OPEC production. Further, OPEC is dominated by Saudi Arabia, which wishes to have a greater share of revenues from production. That country currently controls more than 20 per cent of conventional world reserves, whereas Canada controls little more than 1 per cent of world reserves. Canada, however, has among the world's largest deposits of bitumen or tar sands. Saudi Arabia increased its production and caused the worst collapse in the Canadian oil industry's history. Saudi objectives include: bringing other OPEC members into line, asserting control over important non-OPEC producers, and causing the development of non-conventional oil, such as tar sands, bitumen and off-shore production, and other high cost oil, such as marginal wells, to be unprofitable.

Their strategy is working. First, the OPEC cartel is once again functioning in an effective way. For example, it agreed in August to reduce production by 3.5 million barrels per day for the months of September and October. Without that agreement, prices would have been as much as 50 per cent higher than the current price of around $15 U.S. Second, Third World non-OPEC producers, such as Mexico, Egypt,

Angola, Malaysia and Oman, as well as some other non-Third World countries—notably excluding Britain—have agreed to production cuts. Even Premier Getty of Alberta has had discussions with Sheik Yamani of Saudi Arabia about production cuts in the province of Alberta. Third, and most important of all to Canada, the strategy to chill out non-conventional production is succeeding. We see the shut-down of our frontier exploration and development projects, as well as hope for future and, ultimately, existing tar sand, bitumen and heavy oil projects.

I would like to emphasize the gravity of our problem with an example. A newly formed group called the Engineering Contractors Association made up of chief executive officers of major engineering contractors in Canada, which companies represent about 80 per cent of the engineering construction industry in Canada, indicate their combined staff has fallen from more than 20,000 in 1981 to some 12,000 in mid-1986. Based on present work backlog, staff in western offices will, unless some major project, such as the Husky Upgrader, proceeds before year end, be down to 1,100 by January 1987.

The disappearance of these skilled people in such large numbers for any long period of time will, in my opinion, seriously threaten our ability to respond to our future energy needs. In other words, our ability to provide for our long term energy needs is seriously threatened.

If there is any doubt about this statement, let me remind honourable senators that the National Energy Board has predicted our production from conventional light reserves will decline from the current 1.2 million barrels per day to 650,000 barrels per day by the year 2005. That 650,000 barrels includes a forecast frontier production of approximately 275,000 barrels per day, offshore east coast and in the Beaufort. This decline in production must be replaced by more expensive non-conventional production. This is not happening and the industry predicts that it will not happen at current price levels for crude oil.

So far my comments have focused on oil problems, but problems with the natural gas industry are closely related, because oil and gas are competing fuels in many markets.

The problems that arise as a result of the process of so-called deregulation of the gas industry are special, and I would like to comment on some serious difficulties we face.

The industry has, to varying degrees, been regulated from as far back as the 1950s, with the introduction of the requirement that Canada maintain a surplus for its future needs. The price of natural gas has been regulated since 1975. A surplus test is administered by the National Energy Board. As a result, it is necessary for the board to establish rules and hold hearings to confirm the existence of the mandated surplus and, further, to determine the extent to which volumes of gas in excess of that required surplus may be licensed for export and to whom those licences are to be granted. Another responsibility of the board, of course, has to do with facilities for transmission of energy and the cost of transmission.

The combination of this government's so-called gas deregulation policy and the collapse in oil prices has caused chaos in the industry; chaos which will heighten on November 1, the date set for completion of the deregulation of natural gas marketing. I should explain the use of the word "so-called" when referring to deregulation of the gas industry. The reason is highlighted by the gas export industry and by the Government of Alberta statements to the effect that one cannot have true market sensitive pricing as long as a surplus must be maintained to serve long-term Canadian needs, and there is in place the "adjacent area price test." That is a prohibition against exporting natural gas at a price less than that in the area adjacent to the point of export.

The industry's frustration is expressed by gas producers who say that if the surplus test and price test are to remain in effect, they cannot deal with the major Canadian purchasers of gas in a free market environment. Accordingly, the government should either truly deregulate, dropping these tests, or regulate properly. Both buyers and sellers are unhappy, or potentially unhappy, because what we are ending up with is neither a free market nor a well-regulated market.

What should Canada be doing in light of the problems we now face? First, with respect to oil, the government should pursue solutions like those suggested by the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources in its report on Oil Marketing: 1986, tabled in June of this year. I have already spoken in this chamber in favour of the recommendations set out in the report and will not repeat those comments now. There are, in addition, other suggestions which should be considered, including the proposal for a stabilization fund, an incentive price for new oil, more generous tax incentives to invest in the oil and gas sector, such as those which now exist for the mining sector.

Second, with respect to gas, the government has a difficult choice, which I have, in part, described above. Canada should either truly deregulate the industry by removing all obstacles to the operation of a free market or, in the alternative, regulate properly. Proper regulation would involve the difficult task of further consultation with the provincial governments and producing groups involved. The challenge would be to establish a price-setting mechanism which would ensure no loss of our potential to export more natural gas to the United States—we currently market almost half the gas we produce into that region—and, further, to have natural gas priced fairly to Canadian users, having regard to the price of competing fuels and security of supply.

I have tried to state briefly the case for policy change and suggest generally what that change should be. I would like now to comment on what is, in fact, happening now that we are some ten months into the crisis. The government has made some helpful variations in its policy by, first, increasing to $2 million the amount of oil and gas revenues exempt from the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax, and exempting synthetic oil production from that tax altogether and, finally, as of October 1, completely eliminating the PGRT.

[Senator Hays.]

It is important to note that these are not really changes in policy but a welcome acceleration in the planned withdrawal of the tax in response to the unexpected 50 per cent fall in the price of oil during the early months of this year, and recognition that the rationale for this tax disappeared with the high price of oil. It is most unfortunate that the Government of Alberta, until today, had not seen fit to reduce its royalties. The high royalties in Alberta were in existence for the same reason that the PGRT was in existence. The Government of Alberta has today announced a program to assist the energy sector. The only information I have is that apparently it is a stabilization program. When the program was announced, the Premier of Alberta was at great pains to indicate that he was sorry that the plan was not being participated in by the federal government. However, he pointed out that the federal government had simply refused to do so. I should not comment further because, as I say, I do not have many details.

Unfortunately, this creates a problem. The fact that Alberta finds it necessary to go it alone will contribute to differences in policy between the producing provinces and will contribute to disharmony as between province and province and as between province and the federal government. This will result in a marked departure from the stated objective of this government to use energy policy as an instrument of national reconciliation.

In any event, the government's position, apart from the PGRT relief mentioned, is that it is prepared to do nothing to encourage the industry to replace reserves which are being exploited or to ensure that we will be able to respond with more expensive production from offshore, tar sands, bitumen and heavy oil when the price of oil inevitably rises. The government seems to expect that the marketplace, which is not a particularly well-noted, long-range visionary, will look after the Canadian interest.

I certainly have no objection to reliance on the marketplace as a determinant of activity, but, quite frankly, I do not believe, as stated earlier, that it is market forces that have created the existing crisis or, for that matter, the high-price crises we experienced in the 1970s. We are being naive in the extreme not to recognize that the price is being manipulated, and we must act accordingly to protect our interests. The market-based policy can be relied on if the market truly does function as a free market, or if the price is manipulated so as to function like a free and stable market. Outside that scenario, we must recognize the necessity to intervene and ensure our long term interests are well served.

It is not often remembered in western Canada that when the government introduced its new energy policy, it gave a commitment to consumers. The communique accompanying the Western Accord states in part, and I quote:

Canadian consumers will be protected from the volatility of international markets. If world prices escalate rapidly, or if security of supply is threatened, the federal government, in consultation with the producing provinces, would take appropriate measures to protect Canadian interests.

The Western Accord itself states that potentially negative impacts on Canada that resulted in a sharp change in price would prompt appropriate measures following consultation with the provinces. However, judging by its actions, it appears that while this government is prepared to help consumers, it does not feel committed in the same way to helping producers when the price is drastically low.

When pressed in western Canada, government representatives usually respond by waving the Western Accord and listing the acronyms of the various taxes which have been withdrawn with the passage of the National Energy Program. This is no longer a sufficient response to the crisis which is occurring in western Canada involving the potential loss of between 100,000 and 200,000 jobs over the next two to three years; and it is not an adequate response to the serious threat to our ability to meet the oil and gas energy needs of Canada over the long term.

In the final analysis, it seems that there is only a political answer in the event the government is bound and determined to do nothing other than stay the course of the various accords and respond with free enterprise rhetoric to those who urge the kinds of solutions to our energy problems, some of which were put forward earlier in this speech. Put in these stark terms, at least western Canadians would know that their only choice for a change in policy would involve withholding the immense political support that western Canada has given to the Conservative Party since the days of John Diefenbaker. The Pembina by-election results are a strong signal of the beginning of this process.

On motion of Senator Macquarrie, debate adjourned.

VISIT BY CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION TO BELGIUM

Hon. Paul David rose pursuant to notice of inquiry of Wednesday, October 8, 1986:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the visit of a Canadian parliamentary delegation to Belgium in response to an invitation from the Belgian Parliament, from May 11 to 17, 1986.

He said: Honourable senators, my apologies for rising for the second time today. I have the pleasure of reporting on the official visit to Belgium of a joint parliamentary delegation from Canada, from May 11 to 17, 1986.

The delegation was headed by the Speaker of the Senate, the Hon. Guy Charbonneau, and included two other senators, the Hon. Ernest Cottreau and myself. There were five members of the House of Commons, namely, the Hon. Monique Landry, Minister for External Relations, and Messrs. Jim Hawkes, Russell MacLellan, John Parry and Guy St-Julien. Mrs. Carol Chafe acted as secretary for the delegation and Ms. Claude Ouimet as the Speaker's secretary. The delegates were accompanied by their spouses.

The visit was in response to an invitation by the Belgian Parliament, and our hosts were the Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Edward J. Leemans, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Mr. Jean Defraigne.

I think we will all remember the very cordial welcome we received and the absolutely perfect way our very busy but also very instructive and pleasant schedule was organized. Throughout our stay, Messrs. Roger Mangen, Senior Executive Advisor and Secretary General of the Belgian group of the Inter-Parliamentary Union and Jan Claes, Senior Division Advisor and Secretary of the Belgium-Canada section of the Inter-Parliamentary Union were our guides, ever dedicated, charming and efficient and always ready to answer any questions we might have.

On Monday morning, Mr. Max Yalden, the Canadian Ambassador, assisted by his staff, gave an interesting briefing session on the economic, political, diplomatic and linguistic situation in Belgium. This overview gave us some insight into the political ambience and helped us in our conversations with the many parliamentarians we met subsequently.

Our first official act was taking part in a commemorative ceremony at the Canadian military cemetery at Agedem.

In the presence of the Mayor of Maldegem and many local officials, the leader of our delegation laid a wreath on the cenotaph on behalf of the Parliament and the people of Canada. In his speech he recalled the painful price paid by "Canadians who are still proud of having served the supreme cause of freedom, together with their Belgian friends."

The ceremony was followed by a reception at the town hall, a lunch nearby and a tour of the romantic city of Bruges, famous for its role in history, its canals, churches and museums, its parks and its crafts people.

Tuesday was spent entirely on meetings with parliamentarians: welcome speeches by both Speakers, a joint meeting with 30 members of the Senate and the House, a working lunch, a session with the chairman and a dozen members of the Permanent Commission on Language Control, and a meeting with the Minister of External Affairs, Mr. Leo Tindemans.

Honourable senators, I would like to give you some personal impressions of this visit.

The main problem besetting this nation which became independent in 1830 seems to be that of national unity, with two language groups whose numbers are about equal. This country, which covers an area of less than 31,000 square kilometers has a population of 10 million, of whom 55 per cent speak Flemish and 45 per cent French. History was responsible for drawing a dividing line between the two groups. In 1963, Parliament passed legislation making Flemish the only official language in the five provinces of Flanders in the north, and French the sole official language in the four provinces of Wallonia in the south. Brussels is considered to be a bilingual city.

This linguistic duality is also reflected in the country's many political parties. There are three main groups, each with a Flemish and a Wallonian section, whose objectives are not necessarily the same. In any case the government is seldom in a majority position and, after a complicated consensus process overseen by the king, they appoint the Prime Minister and a coalition cabinet where both groups of people must have fair representation. The rotation system which is traditional makes central power appointments all the more complicated.

The House of Representatives is made up of 212 elected members, and the Senate has 184 members: 106 are elected by the people, 51 by provincial councils, and 26 by the Senate. Legislation may be introduced in either the House or the Senate, but it must be sanctioned in both official languages to become law.

In the end, honourable senators, political balance depends on the skill and will of senators and Belgian members to settle their differences through compromise. I noticed they all have a mischievous and realistic sense of humour, which happens to be one of the best ways to avoid the stress caused by an extremely complicated system.

The Belgian parliamentarians asked many questions of our delegates, and vice versa. One of the major topics of discussion was the rather high unemployment among youths, a situation with which we are familiar here in Canada. Then there was the budget deficit, the extent of the national debt and budgetary cut-backs, the distribution of powers between the central government and the provinces, the environment, the impact of the Chernobyl nuclear accident which had occurred just a few days before, the funding of social and health programs, free trade and the European Common Market experience, the fight against international terrorism and, finally, the deployment of missiles under NATO agreements.

The day ended with a banquet given by our hosts in a splendid Parliament suite designed for such functions. In his address our Speaker mentioned the main similarities between our two countries: two representative constitutional monarchies, our linguistic duality, our central and provincial powers, our pacifist influence on the major powers, and our active participation in international organizations. As he said: "We feel at home in Belgium because of our similar yet distinctive parliamentary institutions, and because of our common concept of a way of life inspired by our European ancestry."

In Liège, on Wednesday, the delegates visited the Val Saint-Lambert glassworks, a hundred-year-old craftshop which had to adapt to modern technology and revamp its financial structure to regain some profitability.

The mayor was our host at city hall and later in a Vieux Liège restaurant. This capital city of the Belgian French community has many industries located along the shores of the river Meuse. Our return trip through the Ardennes reminded us of our Laurentians. The day ended with a fabulous gastro-nomic dinner offered by the Belgian-Canadian Interparliamentary Union in a Brussels restaurant.

On Thursday in Antwerp, the main city of the Flemish region, we were taken by the local authorities to a diamond cutting workshop, Rubens's house (now a museum), the Town Hall and the port facilities on the Escaut River. One is impressed to see how dynamic, productive and industrialized this economic metropolis is, and how modern the facilities of its booming port are. The day ended with a highly successful function at our ambassador's residence.

Honourable senators, throughout that week, the parliamentarians of both countries had the occasion to feel the warmth of a longtime friendship, and to explore even deeper avenues for economic and cultural exchanges. In concluding, to sum up my impressions of that official visit, I am pleased to quote an excerpt of a speech by the Chairman of our delegation: "If we are so happy to be with you, it is because you are such a source of admiration for us. Where could one find more strongly elegant gothic architecture than in your country? Where could one find so many universities of international ranking in such a small territory? Where could one find such big factories in such a densely populated area? Finally, where could one find such avant-garde and internationally-minded economy?"

I thank you, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak to this order, I declare the debate over.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TAX REFORM

CONSULTATION PROCESS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The Minister of Finance has indicated that he is moving forward on a comprehensive type of tax reform. He has also indicated that he intends to enter into a consultation process some time between now and the next budget. My question is: Is it the government's intention to issue a white paper dealing with tax reform to assist in the consultation process?

Senator Sinclair: I understand that. However, the only thing I have seen is a series of principles which are very general in form. They deal with such subjects as simplicity, efficiency, and so forth. That does not leave much ground for dealing with the consultative process related to the complicated question of tax reform. Is that all we are to have before the budget?

Senator Murray: The statement of the Minister of Finance is that specific directions for change will be outlined at the time of the next budget.

Senator Frith: He is asking if there is to be consultation before then.

Senator Sinclair: What I am really driving at is: I believe the Minister of Finance made a statement to the effect that he expected the Finance Committee of the other place to consider the guidelines and to come forth with recommendations that would assist him in bringing forth comprehensive changes in time for the next budget. My question was directed toward giving some help to the members of this house to see if they could also come forth with suggestions to assist the minister.

Senator Murray: As I understand it, the committee of the House of Commons is being asked to review the guidelines Mr. Wilson set out in his speech and to make specific recommendations as to how his goals can be achieved.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, to achieve the goal of fairness, which is one of the guidelines, one has to know how the minister is going to get there. One cannot just say that they agree with the guideline of fairness. That is like asking someone if they love their mother. The answer is always "yes."

Surely, that is not enough to go on, and not enough to enable any realistic assistance to be given.

Senator Murray: As I understand the timetable envisaged by Mr. Wilson, he expects the committee of the House of Commons to consider the guidelines that he set out in his speech and to make recommendations so that his goals can be achieved. That would happen before the minister brought in his specific proposals.

Senator Sinclair: One of those guidelines, honourable senators, is fairness. Does the minister want parliamentarians to come forth with ideas of fairness from Canadians generally, or ideas of fairness from Canadians earning less than $20,000 a year, or ideas of fairness from Canadians earning $200,000 a year? Just where is the guideline of fairness to apply?

Senator Murray: I am not sure that "fairness" is such a relative concept. As a matter of fact, I would think that the honourable senator, his colleagues and members of the committee of the other place would have, on the basis of their experience as legislators and their experience in the private sector, many ideas on how the tax structure of Canada can be made fairer than it is. The minister looks forward to receiving those proposals before developing his specific propositions.

Senator Sinclair: I thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate. What he has said enables me to suggest to my colleagues on the committee that we have a special reference to deal with the matter.

Senator Murray: I presume my friend will speak to Senator Frith about the committee's budget.

Senator Sinclair: He is easy on budgets.

Senator Frith: I am just tough on rules.

INDUSTRY

AEROSPACE—ALLOCATION OF CF-18 SERVICE CONTRACTS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

On Tuesday of this week, in giving a delayed answer to a question I asked relating to the CF-18 service contracts, the Deputy Leader of the Government stated:

The allocation of service contracts for the CF-18 aircraft is presently being considered by Treasury Board. A decision is expected within the week.

Can the leader tell the Senate whether a decision has been taken?

Senator Molgat: I wonder, then, whether the leader would care to comment on the headline today in La Presse, which states:

[Translation]

CF-18 Service Contracts to Canadair. Prime Minister Mulroney appeals strongly to party unity.

The report adds that the Prime Minister made a statement on the subject at yesterday's national caucus. Would the minister be willing to comment or explain the situation?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the report in La Presse is at the very least premature. I must add it is not the first time that has happened.

[English]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SAUDI ARABIA—REPLACEMENT OF SHEIK YAMANI

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to draw to the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate—and I am sure he is already aware of this—the fact that Sheik Yamani was replaced yesterday. I say “replaced” because I am not sure what other term is applicable. He was a very influential person in the international oil markets, and this has a great effect on Canada's oil industry—

Senator Frith: It would be quite a “shake-up,” you might say.

Senator Olson: —and, indeed, has sent shock waves through the whole international oil industry already. In fact, I think several of the oil and petroleum commodities have gone up to the limit today. Can you tell me whether the government has any view with respect to this rather startling development?

Senator Nurgitz: It depends on the instructions.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

CRITERIA FOR APPROVING PROPOSALS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, apparently Canada has its answer to Howard

[Senator Molgat.]

Hughes in the person of a Mr. Howard White. His company, Financial Engineering Corporation, had applied to the federal Department of Regional Industrial Expansion to register at least nine projects, I believe, in Cape Breton, that would cost more than $200 million to complete. The proposals included: a flying saucer that would be used as an airliner; wave energy platforms to generate electricity from ocean waves, to be built in a Cape Breton shipyard; remote pilotless aircraft equipped with cameras for surveillance; a low-cost robot arm; modular housing; and the construction of components for plants that would burn garbage.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government—and he will, perhaps, have to take this question as notice—could tell us the headings under which those somewhat exotic proposals were given initial approval so that we will have some idea as to the kind of applications that might be entertained by the agency, and, particularly, in Atlantic Canada.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to clarify for us, if he will, the position of his government with respect to research and development in Canada. We have been watching with great anxiety the situation at the National Research Council. I wonder if he would be kind enough to explain what the government's policy is now in that field.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, if the honourable senator is referring to the reallocation of moneys at the National Research Council, the fact is that the NRC has announced that it will be redirecting its R&D programs in order to commit more efforts to Canada's new space program. The NRC is, therefore, cutting $20 million from its annual $400-million budget.

Senator Marsden: The government, in coming into office, was on record as being committed to increasing the expenditure in this country on R&D. Does that policy still hold?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the government is committed to doing everything possible to increase the proportion of gross national product that is devoted to research and development in this country. Yes, that policy still holds.

Senator Marsden: In light of the developments at the National Research Council, does that imply that the government's policy is to expend those funds in university and private sector R&D?

Senator Murray: Well, I think my honourable friend is jumping to conclusions there, but I will make an inquiry and see what further information on the policy can be brought forward.

SPACE RESEARCH AGENCY LOCATION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: May I ask, finally, in light of the decision which will be taken tomorrow on the CF-18 service contract and the link that has been made, at least in the minds of some people, between the decision on that contract and the location of the space research agency, or whatever form it is to take, if the Leader of the Government in the Senate will be prepared to inform this chamber, at the earliest opportunity next week, of developments in the location of the space agency.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I will bring forward all the available information next week, honourable senators, yes.

Senator Argue: We have it already; it is in the newspapers.

TRANSPORT

CLOSING OF CN SHOPS, MONCTON

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform this chamber of the final outcome of negotiations between the unions involved and CN regarding the closing of the CN shops in Moncton?

Canadian National states that in its negotiations with the unions affected by the sale of the Moncton shops it, Canadian National, had agreed to a news blackout governing details of the package offer. It has also committed itself not to comment on union reaction until it has been officially advised by all unions concerned as to whether or not they had accepted or rejected the offer.

The company, I am informed, is aware of the news reports about the voting, which some of us heard this morning, but has not yet been officially advised of the outcome of voting. It expects to be advised later today, after which it will issue a response.

Senator Thériault: I am sure the Leader of the Government in the Senate is aware that the deadline for final acceptance or rejection of the offer, as established by CGE, is tomorrow. Could the minister inform this chamber if there has been any extension by CGE of that proposed deadline?

Senator Murray: I am not aware that that has happened, honourable senators.

ENTERPRISE CAPE BRETON

POSSIBLE ASSISTANCE TO FINANCIAL ENGINEERING CORPORATION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is supplementary to that asked by Senator Frith with respect to the activities of the Toronto businessman, Howard White.

In his speech on October 7, 1986 the minister stated:

We set up the Enterprise Cape Breton agency. I am told that up to now they have received over 1,000 applications. The agency has made 511 offers of assistance.

I wonder if, in making his inquiries for Senator Frith, the minister could find out whether, among these 1,000 applications, there are any applications from Mr. White, and whether any offers of assistance have been made to him among the 511 offers which the agency has made.

THE ALLIANCE NATIONALE CONSOLIDATED ACT, 1945

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, for Senator Cogger, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

FISHERIES

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the First Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries presented earlier this day.

Hon. Jack Marshall moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, the amount of funding as shown in appendix (A) of the report, $50,780, is the amount required by the committee for its trip to the west coast, from November 13 to November 25, to examine all aspects of the marketing of fish in that area. The original budget as proposed was approved by the Senate Subcommittee on Budgets prior to the end of the last session. The budget we are currently asking the Senate to consider is the same as the previous budget, less an expenditure in the amount of some $14,000.

The committee is pledged to leave on November 13. Due to the shortage of time, we ask that the Senate approve the funding in the amount of $50,780 so that we can proceed with this trip to the west coast. I would appreciate consideration and approval of this report today.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, just to continue this running serial on expenses and authorities, in this case, because the funding that goes with the authority is presented to us as part of a report of a committee, and because we are being asked only for the adoption of the report, we end up getting what we would always like to have; that is, before we are asked to vote on the matter, we can see how much it is going to cost. I propose to support the motion.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I, too, would be glad to support the motion as it relates to the requested funding. However, I have one problem with this report. Senator Marshall has asked for authority to adjourn from place to place within and outside Canada. Since the committee is travelling only within Canada, why is he asking for authority to adjourn from place to place outside Canada?

I raise this point because it seems to me that Senator Marshall should ask for the authority that he needs to do what he proposes to do, but that he should not ask for authority beyond that, such as to travel outside Canada.

Senator Marshall: In response to Senator Olson's question, on its trip to the west, the committee is planning to visit Alaska, which is, of course, in the United States. That is the reason for the request for authority to adjourn from place to place outside Canada.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that, then, is the answer. I was unaware that it was proposed to visit the United States, in addition to the west coast.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Cogger, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, for an Address to Her Excellency the Governor General in reply to Her Speech at the opening of the Session.—(Honourable Senator Macquarrie) (4th day of resuming debate).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, it is the custom—and, in this case, it is a very happy experience for me to repeat it—to congratulate the mover and seconder of the motion. I was sorry to be absent in the United Kingdom at a CPA conference on the day of their speeches, but I read them as soon as I returned, and I was full of regret that I had missed them.

The sparkling impartiality of Senator Barootes was interesting and inspiring. The breadth and grasp of the subject matter which he displayed was the kind of thing that makes another senator proud. The exchange between himself and Senator Steuart put the lie to a remark I read in a newspaper that it was a dull election in Saskatchewan. I said, "Good God, they should have been in the Senate that day. They would not have found it too dull," from what I read in Hansard. It is not always that Hansard, and the Senate Hansard, in particular, excites people and elevates the blood pressure; but that was a very lively day, most certainly, and I congratulate my colleague, Senator Barootes. He is obviously as good a parliamentarian as he is a doctor—and that is pretty good, from what I hear from those who know.

Senator Cogger I have known for a long time. The last time we were exchanging ideas was in the old days when I was a member of the National Executive of the Conservative Party. Obviously, that was in the days when they lost elections. He and I had an idea on voting within the party that made Marshall McLuhan look rather out of date. But no one took up our idea, and I suppose that in 20 years' time some bright, eager lad will pick it up, as we picked it up four or five years ago. I am glad he is in the Senate and I congratulate him.

I believe this is the first time I have had an opportunity to congratulate the new Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Leader of the Senate in the Government—which is at least as important a role for him. I have known Senator Murray for so long that I remember him as a bright-eyed juvenile-faced young man with an enormous intellect—and, by Jove, he is still all of those things, to the envy of some of us who age and age and age until we forget when we were even middle-aged.

I am very much impressed by his appointment in reference to what, in the old days, we used to call Dominion-Provincial Relations. With his knowledge of all of the provinces—where he has been involved in administration and electioneering on many occasions; once in a while he lost, and sometimes it was the other way—and with his patience and insight, I believe he is just the man to deal with that very important question.

I would also like to say a word, if my colleagues would permit me, about the late Senator MacDonald, because, again, I was not here when tributes were paid to him, who, in a way, was my predecessor in the Senate in that he designated himself as the senator for Queens, which was the constituency in the other house which I once represented. The Leader of the Opposition referred to him as being a man of great directness in his conversation and opinions—and that is exactly what he was.

At that time, in the 1950s, we had in the House of Commons another MacDonald, namely, Colonel John A. MacDonald, a gentle, kindly, wonderful man. He was my roommate in the Centre Block. He spoke so quietly that he was nick-named "Whisper MacDonald". But no one every called J.J. "Whisper"—never! J.J. spoke with great volume and certainty. I remember that when he came up here, I came over to visit him in the Senate and said, "How do you like the Senate, J.J.?" His answer was cryptic and very revealing, I thought. He said: "My God, Heath, how could you help but like it?" When I think of the number of people in Prince Edward Island who are interested in the Senate vacancy at the present time, I have the feeling that J.J. had the whole thing sized up pretty well.

I was flattered that the giant across the way, the Leader of the Opposition, brought my name into the debate early in his speech. He was kind enough to refer to what I had said two years ago, in 1984. At that time, in my usual modest, mild and objective way, I said that I was standing in the only legislative assembly in the whole of Canada in which there was a Liberal majority.

Then he, very skillfully—and he is enormously skillful in debate—reminded everyone how events had overborne my comments—and, indeed, he did it so well that some senators were asking me later if somehow I had made a mistake two years ago. I thought of that expression "Oh ye of little faith", that I should be wrong. I want it to be known that I stated the case as it then was. It was a good thing that I said it then. It wasn't for too long that I could say it. But I gave no guarantee about perpetuity. But Senator MacEachen did do me a favour. He directed my attention, and that of all of us, to important provincial contests; and now I return him the favour. I will follow his illustrious example and will bring him up to date on two elections which have occurred not only since 1984 but since he made his speech; and, in the spirit of the Mets versus the Red Sox, we look upon this as team events. I have tallied the result in these two games and, as I read it, the score is 76 for my team and 1 for his team. So, I am glad he asked me to look at these things—

An Hon. Senator: Another moral victory!

Senator Macquarrie: —and I hope that I will be able to keep looking at them with the same fervour I feel in reporting on this one.

Even on Thursday we must be serious in this deliberative assembly.

The Speech from the Throne was very well written, I thought—not quite so artistic as the on two years ago—

Senator Frith: Author, author!

Senator Macquarrie: —but it was very good and should satisfy even such a purist as Senator Frith. As many speakers have done, I will pick just one aspect. I believe we have had a fine debate so far by honourable senators doing just that. We have had senators stand and discuss subjects in a very informative way. I was pleased to see in the Throne Speech:

Our support for the multilateral institutions and agencies of which we are members remains the cornerstone of our foreign policy.

Of course, we think inter alia of the Commonwealth and the United Nations. One of the sadnesses of my years of contemplation of the international scene has been the decline of regard for the United Nations in many parts of this continent. That great body has been facing serious problems in recent years. It has been castigated particularly in the United States. One hears references to "automatic majorities," as if that is a very evil thing. There are references to "voting blocs," "gang-ing-up," "irresponsibility" and "propaganda"—reminding me of the Canadian politician who said there was too much politics in the House of Commons. We might think of some parliamentary bodies as we refer to these charges. Another one is "wastefulness." That is always talked about by those who are out of office. Long, long ago, in the 1950s and 1960s, I had the honour of representing Canada in the General Assembly, in the days when the late Sidney Smith was our minister and, after him, the Honourable Howard Green. Both of those men served with distinction and with broad appreciation down there. I was always proud to be in their delegation and to support them in their efforts.

In those days there was no talk of "automatic majorities." It was not a bad thing. Majorities were good because, when the chips were down, the majority could nearly always be gathered in to support an American position. It is important that we reflect upon and try to get through some of these prejudiced judgments, because the world has changed. That organization started with 55 members. One almost had to be a war-like member of the last war to get into that peaceful body. It was an extension of the wartime alliance, and the membership process was understood. Many nations did not get in. They did not even try, because they knew that they would not make it.

However, in that broadening-out process as reflected in a larger UN membership, there was great credit to the UN itself. When I was very young, one would look at the map of Africa and relate the various colours of the countries to some country in Europe. The biggest portion of the map was red, and that was British. The red ran from Cairo to Cape Town. The French colour was purple. There were only two little spots on the map of Africa which signified the independent countries—Liberia and Ethiopia. The General Assembly's fourth committee presided over, assisted and furthered the movement from colonial status to full independence for many African countries, until, in the 14th General Assembly, its president, that distinguished diplomat from Ireland, Fred Boland, named the General Assembly the "African Assembly," because so many people there had moved from the darkness of subjugation to the light of independence. The UN was enormously helpful. When the representatives of these countries came and were received as spokesmen in the international community, it was an enormously significant thing, just as it meant a great deal to Canada a generation earlier to be accepted as a charter member of the League of Nations. Robert Borden insisted in the discussions with the great powers that every one of the independent dominions—independent domestically—be accorded membership, and he succeeded. These things do mean a great deal.

If diversity prevails and multiplicity is the watchword, naturally, with different cultures and systems the organization becomes vastly different—more complex, far removed from the easy, comfortable days when there were 55 members. But would we really like to have the easier older way—small, likely to follow, generally speaking, a western approach and using western idioms? Of course, we would not, any more than we would yearn to get back to the days of the Commonwealth when it consisted essentially of Britain and the old dominions, a handful of nations who could say they speak the same language and thought along somewhat the same lines.

Naturally, when it comes to choosing the broad or the narrow, all of us would know what to do. That is why I was very happy to see recognition in the Throne Speech of Canada as a great UN member. In the League of Nations we were a lousy member—anxious to get in, but subsequently did a very poor job. That is not the case in the United Nations. From the very beginning that organization was marked by a Canadian care to be responsible. I often wondered if we did not spend too much time concerning ourselves with how we would vote on a certain part of a certain resolution, but the idea of careful responsibility was there. We could not, for the sake of on the spot popularity, support emotionally something that was going on in one of the committees or commit ourselves to something that we were not prepared ourselves to put into effect. That attitude held throughout, and I think it was very worth while. I see the hand of the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent and the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, who would be just the types to take that responsible point of view. Some members would vote one way in one committee and totally opposite in another. They did not worry about the inconsistency. That was not the case with Canada. I think the Prime Minister was right on target the other day when he went down to the UN on UN Day, and I commend him for doing so. He spoke about one of the problems facing the UN, the nonpayment of obligations. He said, “pay up,” and was not admonishing only the poor countries. Canada may take great pride in its past and in its tradition with regard to the UN.

We can be proud, too, of the people we have sent there. Mr. Pearson would be considered the greatest, and there is no question that we would all so regard him. He is a father of the United Nations. However, down through the years there have been others. I have seen many of them and know how well they were received and how effective they were. I often think that we have such a good reputation at the United Nations that it is almost painful to live up to. Yet, that is the kind of challenge we should welcome and not complain about. I pay tribute to the people—the ministers, the officials and the delegates—who, down the years, have worked hard to maintain for Canada a decent, honourable and reliable image.

We have heard a great deal in the media, occasionally in this house and frequently in the other House, about appointments. I would like to refer to one appointment and, perhaps, more than one. I do not think that the Prime Minister could have chosen a more articulate man than Stephen Lewis to go down to the United Nations to represent us. As our ambassador, he is today regarded as probably the foremost public protector and advocate of the ideals of the United Nations. Throughout the United States and beyond, he has raised the standard of regard for that institution with courage, with eloquence and with unfailing fidelity. He is a great credit to us and to our country, by strengthening the United Nations, which still serves, with all its faults and with all its weaknesses, as a great and continuing contributor to the peace of this world.

Another appointment is Douglas Roche, a man whom I have known for a long time. He was a champion of good internationalism and a determined supporter of disarmament the first time I ever heard him speak, and he still is. Political leaders all over the world have praised him and appreciated him, and so should we. That is another appointment that is a laurel to the Prime Minister and a credit to the country.

I now come to one appointment that is even closer to my heart. The great continent of Africa is suffering travails almost beyond endurance. Those in the south seem to be man-made, and those in the north—although man has had a lot to do with making them worse—we would have to say are God-made. In the south, it is deprivation of human liberty; in the north, it is starvation or near to it. Into this area another Canadian has been sent: Ambassador David MacDonald, a man of the utmost compassion and breadth of understanding of the problems which beset mankind here and abroad. He has been given responsibilities not just for Ethiopia but for the whole of Africa. I do not pretend to be an African oracle—far from it—but I would presume to say that I do not think you could find a Canadian who is better perceived and better received than that man from Prince Edward Island, David MacDonald. Honourable senators, those, then, are three appointments that I will mention, which should result in some restoration of faith in the political process.

The thing that I notice about some of the criticism of appointments is that they are supposed to be bad in that the appointees belong to the party that is in power. What surprises me is the people who are shocked by this. I sometimes think that they should be the last to expect that any politician would automatically exclude his friends and his constituency from anything that might be helpful to them. I never could understand that. Perhaps I am too much of a philosopher and too little of a politician to understand what it means.

Honourable senators, I could talk about all of the good things I see in the Speech from the Throne. I am certainly not going to talk about the ones I do not like, since I do not go in for negative thinking. However, I did read the Speech from the Throne carefully and thought of Senator Frith, who is an inspiration to me because he uses the language so well. In fact, he uses both languages very well. I will not judge his French, but he uses the English language extremely well—

Senator Frith: Look out! Something is coming.

Senator Macquarrie: He helps all of us to purify our manner of expression. I gave him five stars in the last days of the previous session when he addressed that terrible expression "address." I ask him to keep his eye out for that, because I see that expression in some improper places. It seems that we are surrounded by anarchists of grammar and assassins of—

Senator Frith: Syntax?

Senator Macquarrie: Yes, of syntax, and wondrous of words, if you want me to go on with this alliteration. I have to watch my blood pressure, but I thought it popped a little when, some years ago, a Minister of Finance stood up and used the expression "disincentive." I immediately tried to stop that and I told him what to do with it, but he did not listen.

However, the real son-of-a-gun is the expression "at this point in time." Honourable senators, have we lost the capacity to use that simple, three-letter word "now"? It is not hard to spell and not too difficult to pronounce. Of late, I have run across another one. "Disinformation" is an expression that is now in use. I think that is a three-letter word starting with an "i".

I also have trouble with the words "patriation" and "repatriation". In the past I have lost out on this, and I probably will again. With reference to the Constitution, we used to say that what we wanted was "repatriation" of the Constitution. In other words, to bring it back. But some of these murderers of language said, "No, that is not good enough. The real word is 'patriation' since the Constitution never was in Canada." Therefore, by using that word, we repudiated what we had said for a century: In essence, we had the Constitution and all the rest was just formality. The Canadian Constitution was made in Canada. John A. Macdonald said that 95 per cent of it was decided on right there in Charlottetown. In that event, the word should have been "repatriation". In other words, bring it back home where it belongs, to Canada. However, I lost out on that.

I now hear that there is a new usage of the term, and that is the "repatriation" of Quebec. I would like to ask: Where has Quebec been these last few months? I am troubled about that. Quebec was not away and therefore does not need to come back. "Repatriation" means to come back to your country. That troubles me, but, alas, I suppose I will be troubled as long as I am able to talk and as long as I am able to listen.

I intended to discuss one more aspect of the Speech from the Throne, but there is always another day. I was also pleased with the reference to our support of the dialogue between the super powers. If we do not do that, and if they do not do that, I would not like to contemplate the alternative. There is not a great deal of room for the other alternative. I heard a plaintive comment by a teacher the other day. There was some difficulty with respect to getting contrary views from abroad into the school, and some people said: "You cannot do that." The teacher said: "I suppose if we cannot talk to them, we will have to fight them." I thought that was a pretty sad but true reflection.

I hope that the Canadian government will not lose its capacity or its interest in doing everything possible to alleviate tensions. I would like to cite one example. I do not see any better possibility for something to happen in the Middle East than to hold the International Peace Conference there. When I was at the United Nations in June, I had the presumption to suggest that the best thing the Soviet Union could do was to facilitate the re-establishment of diplomatic relations between Israel and themselves. In that process there would be a factor conducive to the holding of that conference. It might fail, but at least we would be heading in the right direction, which is peace.

Honourable senators, there is always a role for Canada with its credentials and its experience and with its basic goodwill across the world. I commend those who wrote the Speech from the Throne and those who are empowered to live up to it. There are many other points I would like to make, but those are the two that concern me so much in these days when there is great anxiety on the international scene.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, in rising to join in this debate, I, too, would like to dwell largely upon one or two subjects, although I will not restrict myself quite as closely as Senator Macquarrie has done. First of all, I would like to associate myself in the usual manner and in a complimentary way with the mover and seconder of the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and extend my congratulations to those others, right down to Senator Macquarrie—whom I always listen to with the greatest of interest and usually enjoyment, and this is also true on this occasion—on the contributions they have made in this debate. The Leader of the Government in the Senate did a very good job, indeed, and I congratulate him. If time permits, I will refer to one of the things that he said in his remarks. May I couple with that my congratulations to him on having become the Leader of the Government in the Senate and a member of the Privy Council and of the Government of Canada. As a sometime maritimer and near-maritimer, may I say how glad we are to have him representing us in the government and leading the governing party in this chamber.

I thought that the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate made a very good and constructive contribution to this debate, as also did the Leader of the Opposition in the other place. I know I am not supposed to dwell upon what is said in that chamber, but the Leader of the Opposition there made some witty, light-hearted and easy remarks in the Throne Speech debate in that chamber.

What of the Speech from the Throne? Senator Macquarrie has said that it is not quite as good and as eloquent as was the 1984 speech. I would say that, to me, it is more of the same—but not much more. That is the way the speech seems to me to be properly characterized.

But, as I said, I am going to refer to one or two specific points. I have been one of those who, ever since the present government took over, commended it for its concern with the deficit of Canada and its stated determination to reduce that deficit and to start the long and difficult process of bringing it under control. I am sorry that the aims and predictions made since the election of 1984 have not been realized, and now look as if they cannot be realized. I acknowledge that some of the reasons for that are the result of events beyond the control of this or any other government of Canada, but some of them are not, and it is to those that I wish to refer.

First of all, it seems to me that the expenditure of the hundreds of millions of dollars to reimburse the creditors—mostly corporate creditors—of the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank was a waste of the taxpayers' money and ought never to have been expended. When the depositors chose to deposit their money in those banks, they did so because they were going to receive a larger return on their money. They did so, particularly the corporate investors, knowing, or they ought to have known, that they were running a greater risk, and when that risk caused their investment to fail, they ought not to have been bailed out by the Government of Canada. That, it seems to me, undermines the very system of Canadian business and Canadian banking. In retrospect, I am sorry that I did not try harder—I do not think I could have accomplished anything—and that I did not speak more loudly and vehemently against the action of the Government of Canada at that time. Well, I hope we will see no more of that.

As another example of the wasteful expenditure of moneys, despite the stated intention of reducing the deficit and of securing good financial management in Canada, some 40 millions of dollars was expended to locate, or to relocate—and I think I may have the indulgence of Senator Macquarrie in this respect—a prison from Drummondville to another part of the province of Quebec. That seems to be an unwarranted expense, and that $40 million-plus, in relation to Canada's budget, is not that great, wait until I tell you about some of the areas where that $40 million-plus would have done a great deal to support institutions of vital importance to Canada and its future.

That brings me, of course, to the subject that I want to speak principally on in my remarks in this debate; that is to say, the faults and short-sighted economy that this government has adopted in reducing the support for research and development in the country. Talk about killing the goose that lays the golden eggs! We are putting ourselves behind our competitors now and, more importantly, in the future, because we are not maintaining our place among the developed, industrialized and technologically competent nations in the world in research and development.

I have been concerned about this subject for a long time. When I first came to this chamber, I served, not at the beginning but in the latter part of its work, on the Lamontagne Special Committee on a Science Policy for Canada. That committee first recommended that Canada should aim to increase its expenditure on R&D to figures comparable to those of West Germany, Japan and the United States. All of those countries had expenditures at or above 2.5 per cent of GNP. We set that as an objective for the Government of Canada as well. I must say that the government of the day paid no attention whatsoever to that recommendation. Oh, they may have paid a little lip service, but in practical terms they did nothing. So, when we revised that estimate later, we lowered our sights and said, "At least you must try to get it up to 1.5 per cent as soon as possible." We even fixed a date and said 1985.

The government did acknowledge that this was an attainable objective and started to move in that direction, and almost reached it. But what has happened over the past two years is that that figure has dropped back to 1.3 per cent. Nevertheless, our Prime Minister says that he is trying to "save our scientists in Canada." He is saving our scientists by cutting millions of dollars of support for scientific research through granting agencies such as the National Research Council, the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council, the Medical Research Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. No, we are taking a very short-term view if we try to save a few million dollars here and allow our effort in basic scientific research to fall further behind those nations of the world with which we must compete.

Our most recent Nobel Prize winner, Dr. John Polanyi of the University of Toronto, is reported to have said to young scientists that they should consider moving to the United States where their efforts will be more realistically supported.

Honourable senators, we cannot afford to lose these people if we hope and intend to maintain our place among the developed nations of the world. It is too bad that we have slipped back even further than we were before in the efforts that we are giving to research and development.

Well, we need money; we need government support; we need government programs as, indeed, every other developed country in the world is doing to support its R&D effort, and we do not need more fancy words and promises that are not followed up by substantial policies.

The Prime Minister again is quoted in the same article to which I referred a moment ago as saying that the Liberals did too little, but it appears that his government is doing even less.

I want to give one other example, which rather surprised me. The following was published in a Halifax newspaper. I apologize for not having the date; however, this is from a reprint of a letter written to the Globe and Mail in Toronto, if you like, by one Sandy McRae, who stated:

"In 1898, the first government fisheries research station in Canada was built after it was shown that Canada was the only civilized country in which no marine biological station had been established. Fisheries Minister Thomas Siddon apparently wants to return us to this 19th century state of affairs.

Over the past 88 years, fisheries and oceanographic research in Canada has grown from a summertime pursuit of a handful of university professors, into a national network of laboratories, ships and research stations which represent one of the few branches of science in which Canadians have achieved international renown. It has been a long struggle to advance this far, and the current disbanding of the Marine Ecology Laboratory at the Bedford Institute of Oceanography is a serious setback. In 1986, the federal government has at last succeeded in effectively crippling basic fisheries and oceanographic research in Canada, without recourse to the tiresome formality of parliamentary processes or the nuisance of listening to scientists.

Mr. Siddon's supposed saving of jobs by shifting staff from basic research sections to his new 'priority areas' of policing fisheries only disguises the fact that he is transmuted Fisheries and Oceans from a functional research division of the government—into a decerebrate monster—all twitching limbs and no brain. This is a fish story with far more serious implications for Canada's future than the tainted tuna scandal. It ought to be causing a much bigger stink."

I am sorry that he ended on the use of that rather inelegant word, but it is, nevertheless, descriptive.

● (1510)

Well, I commend to the government again, even at this late date, the necessity of supporting our research and development activities not only in government institutions and in laboratories, and so forth, but also in our universities, because practical research cannot exist without basic research lying behind it. It is the basic research which is largely done at Canada's universities. I am very skeptical of the proposal which the government has made that they will enable basic research at the universities to be supported by—as stated in one report in the Chronicle-Herald of October 27—as much as $1 billion of research funding. But where is this money to come from? It is to come from private industry, and the government will then match the contributions that private industry makes. The minister, the Honourable Frank Oberle, a person whom I respect and whose judgment I respect, has said that he is pleased with the response which the universities have given to this proposal. It is to the credit of the universities that they have said, "Yes, we will give it a try." But I happen to know, Mr. Oberle, if you don't, that there is not a university in Canada that is sanguine about the likelihood of this kind of research money being derived by this sort of government policy. Yes, the universities will try, as they ought to do, but I think the scheme is doomed to failure from the start, and I doubt if it will procure very much effective money for the research laboratories of the universities of Canada, let alone the $1 billion which is referred to in this release from Ottawa, from the Minister of State for Science and Technology, Mr. Oberle, which is before me. I think this is a very serious matter, and if it should by any chance succeed—and the money, remember, is not to go directly to the universities, it is to go from private businesses through the granting agencies and then to the universities in order to qualify for the matching amount from government—despite my skepticism of the program, I gravely fear that it will induce the same donors to decrease the support that they are making directly to Canada's universities and other research institutions at the present time.

However, I am glad that the universities will try to make it work; I predict that they won't succeed and that the government will have again effectively cut down basic research being carried on in the universities of Canada.

I could say more about post-secondary education, but the Senate Committee on National Finance is coming to the end of its labours in producing a report on post-secondary education in Canada and the federal government's support and involvement, and there will be an opportunity to discuss this subject more thoroughly when that report is before us. So, I shall not talk further about my favourite subject—which some of you in this chamber may think that I have already talked to death—the question of the support of education, particularly post-secondary education.

Senator Murray assured us in his remarks that the present government is improving, or is going to improve, the financial management of our public funds. Well, I hope that this is true, and I hope that there will not be many more examples of the financial management of our public funds such as those to which I referred earlier in this address. It may very well be that if there is to be some improvement in the financial management of our public funds, the government's interest should be extended to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I really am troubled and worried about the budget of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the enormous deficit that is supported by the taxpayers of this country. Is there justification for a government broadcasting agency that costs the people of Canada upwards of $1,000 million dollars or $1 billion a year when it, in my view, does not do anything any better than is being done by other television networks in this country? Some countries that have government supported broadcasting systems pride themselves on being able to give programs of high quality, which are not interrupted every ten minutes—sometimes it is every seven or eight minutes—by juvenile and inane advertisements addressed to people—

Senator Doody: Hear, hear!

Senator Hicks: —with the intelligence and education level of a five-year old child. Really, it destroys one's enjoyment of a serious television program. It seems to me that there is no justification for Canada spending a billion dollars a year on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, because it does not give us objective reporting, and its prejudices, or the prejudices of the employees of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, are manifest and are known to all of us. It does not give us attractive programming which is not dominated by juvenile oriented, inane advertising, as I have put it. I don't know what we should do with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, but I have an idea that the quality of Canadian life would not suffer one bit if this billion dollars were taken out of the budget of Canada entirely.

The other great crown corporation which worries me is the Canada Post Corporation. Again, I don't know whether this government can have any more success in dealing with it than previous governments have had, but I have some hope from Senator Murray's assurances that the present government is improving and will improve its financial management. They had better look at the Canada Post. It is dreadfully over-staffed, it is incompetent in the performance of its duties, and, again, it costs the taxpayers of this country a lot of money.

I know that the labour unions associated with the Canada Post, including Shirley Carr herself, have made all sorts of declarations that this is not the fault of the employees of the Canada Post but is entirely the fault of the management. I should like to remind Mrs. Carr that I went the other day into a small sub-post office in the city of Halifax—I will not be more specific than that—to register a letter. There were only five people in the post office seeking service. One had to go and pull a tag out of a vending machine to be waited upon. We were waited upon in a very slow and deliberate manner by one person who was working at the wicket, but there were four other persons walking around, talking to him and talking to one another during that time. At least it seems to me that the postal unions might tell their members that when they are in a post office in the public view and have nothing to do, they might at least stay out of sight of the customers who are standing in line waiting for the slow service that is meted out to them.

Well, I do not have any solution for the Canada Post Corporation. The only portion of it with which I have had any intimate connection, of course, has been the philatelic section, and the philatelic section is the only division of that postal corporation that operates at a profit. It brings in a profit of some $20 to $30 million a year to Canadians.

Well, honourable senators, I will make one other comment by way of commendation, if you like, to the government. The previous Liberal government, after neglecting our defence forces throughout most of the 1970s, began certain initiatives in the early 1980s which seemed to me to be altogether commendable and which started to improve not only Canada's Armed Forces but the lot of the men and women who serve in them. The present government appears to be carrying on that program and I wish to tender my congratulations to them. But they did promise in 1984, at the election time and shortly after, that they would produce a white paper on defence policy in Canada. This white paper has been sought, at the urging of our Senate Committee on National Defence, for several years, going back, of course, well into the time of the previous government. The previous government would never say that they were going to produce the white paper; the Mulroney government said that it was, and I wish it would. I understand now that we have had one final delay—I hope it is a final delay—and instead of expecting a white paper for the end of 1986, we can look for it at some time in the spring of 1987. This is an important matter. Canadians ought to know the policy and the policy direction of our defence effort, of our relationships with NATO and our commitments to NATO, and to our other allies. I think the production of a white paper will be eagerly awaited by a great many responsible Canadians who are concerned about our defence effort and about the great cost that it brings.

Finally, honourable senators, I want to make a reference to the maintenance contract for the CF-18s. I have never been one who felt that there should be undue special treatment accorded to various regions of Canada. I have always felt that we should try to find what different regions of Canada could do well and support them in the doing of those things rather than try to bolster up uneconomic industries. Indeed, as at least some honourable senators could attest, I have made myself most unpopular in parts of Nova Scotia by stating that we cannot continue to bolster up uneconomic industries and that we should expend our efforts to find something that is viable and that will create employment on an economic basis.

In Atlantic Canada in the last few years we have had a most enterprising group known as the IMP, run or dominated by a brilliant man named Kenneth Rowe. IMP was the lowest initial tenderer for the maintenance contract for the CF-18. After it was apparent that they were the lowest tenderer, the contract was reworked and things were changed to try to engineer the allocation of the contract to someone else, either to a consortium based in Winnipeg or a consortium based in Montreal. It does not appear that the Nova Scotia tender has been taken even as seriously as the Winnipeg one. Nevertheless, it still remains as the lowest tender. Here is something that a company with a proven record is capable of doing and that could be done in Atlantic Canada and that ought to be done in Atlantic Canada.

I also read the article referred to during Question Period which indicated that the contract had already been awarded to Canadair in Montreal. I am glad to have the assurance of the Leader of the Government in the Senate that the contract has not yet been awarded, but my experience is that newspaper leaks of this kind very often turn out to be true, and it looks to me as if the more powerful political influence of the larger province of Quebec has again shut out the opportunity for Nova Scotia to perform a service for the whole of Canada, which this company could do well and could do in a location which is every bit as suitable to the doing of the job as Montreal or Winnipeg or anywhere else in Canada. All I ask is that the lowest tenderer, being a competent tenderer, be awarded the contract.

Honourable senators, I have spoken as much as I ought to. I again commend the previous speakers in this debate, and thank you for the attention that you have given to my contribution.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. John B. Stewart: I wonder if Senator Hicks would permit me to ask him a question related to his speech.

Senator Hicks: Of course.

Senator Stewart: I was interested, honourable senators, in what Senator Hicks just said with regard to the tender from the IMP group for the servicing of the CF-18s. I notice that he says that this is a competent organization; competent to do this work. Certainly, everything I have heard about the group would bear out his assertion.

Nevertheless, it seems to have been reported by somebody that the IMP group was being set aside on the ground that they did not have the engineering or technological capacity for this. Is this leak inaccurate? Does Senator Hicks interpret this allegation against this Atlantic province firm as simply part of a smoke screen to cover up a political decision which was made in favour of another part of the country? What can he say to enlighten us with regard to the competence of the IMP group to perform the work for which they submitted the lowest tender?

Senator Hicks: I think that Senator Stewart, by posing it as a question, has really answered the question. I do not think there can be any truth at all in allegations as to the inadequacy of the engineering expertise available in Nova Scotia and to the IMP group. After all, the Technical University of Nova Scotia has a national standing which is enjoyed by only one or two other engineering schools in the whole country. Nova Scotia, centred in Halifax, has one of the greatest agglomerations of high tech industry that you will find anywhere in Canada, except in the national capital itself.

I do not think there can be any real truth in the assertion that there is not sufficient engineering competence to do this work out of Halifax under the auspices of the IMP group, but I suppose those who seek to wrest the contract away from them must manufacture some reason which they hope will be plausible for doing so.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I should like to offer my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the Throne Speech debate. Although I was not in this chamber at the time they made their speeches, I read their interesting remarks and they are, indeed, deserving of warm congratulations.

Although Senator Murray is not in the chamber at this time, since this is the first occasion I have had to speak in this chamber since his appointment to the cabinet as government leader in the Senate, I should like to extend to him my warmest congratulations and add my voice to the voices of the many who applaud his experience in this particular area of his responsibility. Senator Murray and I go back a few years, and I know that the Prime Minister has chosen well in this particular appointment.

Honourable senators, since this is also the first opportunity I have had to address the Senate in this session, and although Senator Atkins is not in the chamber, I should also like to offer him my warmest felicitations.

To many Canadians, regional disparity is something that they read about or complain about because of needed tax support. For those citizens living in disadvantaged regions, the only yardstick by which we can measure our standard of living is to compare ourselves with other Canadians. When we examine our situation, we find many inequities, and that many government programs have done little to change that situation.

I am sorry that Senator Hicks has left the chamber because I was bemused by his reference to the relocation of a prison. Although I am not very experienced in politics, my memory goes back, at least, to the building of Mirabel Airport. I recall that the Department of Supply and Services opened a federal office in Shediac, where my husband and I live. That move created much appreciated jobs. I also recall the controversy and discussion about the initial expense when the Department of Veterans Affairs was moved to Charlottetown. I am in no way implying that the residents were ungrateful for these changes. Many things are done in the name of helping those who live in disadvantaged areas.

This afternoon, honourable senators, my remarks will concentrate on social justice. I was most encouraged by the references in the Speech from the Throne to social justice.

Before I direct my remarks to particular concerns I have, it might be helpful for those honourable senators in the chamber who live in more advantaged areas of Canada if I quoted some statistics. Those of us who live in areas such as Atlantic Canada or other disadvantaged areas accept these statistics as a daily fact of life. What I shall quote to you will be information gathered from my own province, because I have ready access to that and know that it is accurate. Nothing leads me to believe that my figures are dissimilar to those which would be applicable to other disadvantaged areas in Canada.

In New Brunswick the number of families living on a low income is 15.5 per cent of all families. New Brunswick has 15.5 per cent of its families living at what we would standardize as a low income level, honourable senators, while the national average in Canada—which includes all of the other disadvantaged areas like Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland—is 13 per cent. The per capita income in New Brunswick is 74 per cent of the national average; $10,700 compared to $14,400. The Province of New Brunswick, on a per capita basis, spends approximately $1,100 on health care, while the national average is approximately $1,250—a 12 per cent difference. We are ranked eighth amongst the provinces. On education, New Brunswick spends on a per capita basis approximately $1,050, whereas the rest of Canada spends approximately $1,200. The percentage of the population in New Brunswick receiving unemployment insurance is 8.2, while the national average is 4.5 per cent. The percentage of the population of New Brunswick receiving social assistance is 8.2, while the national average is 6 per cent.

In considering the services provided to people, we might first think of medical services. In New Brunswick there is one doctor for every 830 people, while the national average is one doctor for every 600 people. Our gross domestic product per capita is 64 per cent of the national average.

I thought that by pointing out some of these statistics, it might help those who do not live in areas like New Brunswick to understand the concerns not only of the citizens who live there but of the governments who try to minister to them.

Honourable senators, talking about social policy is always difficult, because we must talk about split jurisdictions. There are certain things that neither a province nor the federal government can do individually—they must be done by way of a joint effort. I was certainly pleased to hear in the Speech from the Throne the reassurance that there will be a revision or a review of policies to make sure that they are achieving the result that they were designed to achieve. We certainly cannot afford to waste dollars on ineffective social programs. New problems, of course, require new programs. Adequate research must be done before tax dollars are spent so as to ensure maximum benefits from those expenditures. In the research and social areas, this is very important, indeed.

Generally speaking, the Canadian government has lacked specific policies in social areas. We cannot really have specific policies unless we have the proper research—proper research on aging, on youth and on poverty. I submit, honourable senators, that this really has not been done by this government or by previous governments.

Honourable senators, I want to spend a few moments on a social concern of mine—and I hope it is a social concern of yours—the problem of aging in Canada. As all senators are aware, the aging population is growing very quickly. The problems of our senior citizens could well develop into the most real and serious social problems that this country will have to solve, merely because of the sheer numbers involved, but I will not bore honourable senators with a list of percentages and statistics.

Some time ago we debated the matter of indexing senior citizens' pensions. If I had thought that the indexing of those pensions would have eliminated poverty amongst our elderly, I would have been the first one to hit the streets with a placard. But we have had indexing of our senior citizens' pensions since the current Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons was the Minister of Finance, and we still have a lot of poverty amongst our elderly. I suppose that is what bothers me the most. What I find even more disturbing is what I have learned about those senior citizens who live alone. Of all senior citizens living unattached in our country in 1985, 46.1 per cent were living in poverty. Honourable senators, that is a lot. Of those living in a family environment, 19.6 were living in poverty. But I say to honourable senators that it is unacceptable that 46.1 per cent of our elderly who live alone are living in poverty. I could not help but think of some of these figures during the debate on the indexing of pensions. Something has to be done. We cannot allow 46.1 per cent of our senior citizens who live alone to live in poverty.

I suppose that the policy for the aging will only be effective if it offers to our senior citizens certain rights—the right to exist legally, the right to exist economically and the right to be involved, in terms of their daily lives. Those are three basics that any citizen of Canada would and should expect. Honourable senators, I am a nutritionist, but speaking from a legal perspective, the elderly are not full members of our society. There are senior citizens in this chamber—God knows that—but many senior citizens in this country are not full members of our society.

One of the basic rights of any citizen is to earn his livelihood in the manner in which he sees fit. Under mandatory retirement legislation, that basic right has been denied to most of those over the age of 65, without regard for their ability or their desire to continue as a valuable member of the labour force.

The Canadian Human Rights Act, which governs the majority of cases of discrimination, has found that mandatory retirement is a bona fide occupational requirement. That is, provided that mandatory retirement is imposed honestly, in good faith and in the sincerely held belief that it is in the interests of adequate performance with all reasonable dispatch, safety and economy. Notwithstanding this, it must also be reasonably necessary to ensure the efficient and economical performance of the job without endangering the employees and the general public.

The legal justification for continued discrimination based on age can be found as recently as a 1982 Supreme Court of Canada decision in the Etobicoke firefighters' case, where it was agreed that an arbitrary retirement age was demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society. It is decisions such as this one that have allowed the practice of legal discrimination to become entrenched in both the public and private sectors.

However, there is hope. Under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which came into effect last year, it is no longer believed that the reasons given under the Canadian Human Rights Act which permitted mandatory retirement can be justified under section 1 of the Charter. Whereas the act must conform to the Charter, there is reason to believe that mandatory retirement will be abolished.

This becomes even more encouraging when we examine the findings of the parliamentary committee on equality rights. The committee not only suggested that mandatory retirement be abolished but it recognized that there are a number of changes the government should consider to accompany the abolition of mandatory retirement. Honourable senators, there are, perhaps, two very important recommendations in this regard. The first is the extension of unemployment insurance coverage to those past the age of 65 who choose to remain in the labour market. The second is making available the full range of employment-training benefits offered by the Canadian Employment and Immigration Commission, without reference to age.

That would help to strengthen the role of the elderly in the community by allowing those who wished to remain in the work force the legal right to do so. More importantly, if the recommendations of the Task Force on Equality are followed, it will allow for seniors to re-enter the work force with the appropriate supports that are now unavailable to them—that is, retraining and the upgrading of their past skills.

We have only begun to address the problem of the role of the elderly in the community. I believe that the greater question in the Canadian context is "How do those seniors who choose retirement survive economically as vital members of the community?" Some of us become very discouraged, and sometimes are reduced to despair, at the lack of research in the area of gerontology. It is common knowledge that there is immediate need for a review of all existing policy related to the aged in this country; but we lack coordination and any consistency in the development of a national policy on aging that pieces together the fragments that now exist.

Ideally, some of us would like to see a Minister of State for Aging, similar to the Minister of State we have to examine the concerns of youth. Realistically, I suppose, we should at least expect a certain division within National Health and Welfare specifically to deal with the concerns of the elderly—but we do not have it—a group responsible for the coordination of all of the moneys earmarked for research in the field of gerontology. It does not sound like a difficult request, but we do not have it—and there is no adequate research going on—none.

The two major federal government sources of money for research are the National Health Research Development Program and the National Welfare Grants. The administration of the National Health Research Development Program estimates that less than 10 per cent of its meagre $1.2 million budget was used for gerontology in 1985-86. But it is not really sure, because it does not break its projects into specific categories. So, it is just a guess.

The National Welfare Grants are broken down by category, but the results are not encouraging. We are now into 1986. Since 1980 there have been only 22 projects relating to the elderly funded under this program; and, for the past seven fiscal years, only $1.9 million has been spent to increase awareness of the concerns of gerontology, the problems of the aged.

Seniors are finding themselves in a world that is ever changing to accommodate the repercussions of the ongoing technological explosion. We see an aging population that has been forced to accommodate and to compromise in a world that places ever-increasing emphasis on achievement, efficiency and economic returns. It is easy to conclude that the aged have been victims of a changing social philosophy, an ongoing change in our social mentality; and, as a result, the future of the aged—the question of living versus surviving—will be determined through the development of a social philosophy and mentality that recognizes, respects, understands and, finally, believes that our senior citizens have a major contribution to make in every community of our country.

I guess I am stating a truism when I say that the role of the elderly must be one of vitality and of contribution. It is a problem that someone will have to address. We cannot walk away from it, and they are not going to walk away from us.

Of course, as I read through the concerns contained in the Throne Speech, I agree that the government must give its highest priority to those who are in greatest need. Although all Canadians can expect the highest quality, for instance, in health care, I believe it is essential that we prioritize our population with regard to social services. Adequate child care must, of course, be made available to those who require it. They are mostly single-parent families, headed by women who have lower incomes. The National Council on Welfare says that while the number of families considered low-income and headed by men fell by 10.6 per cent, the number of low-income families headed by women fell by only 1.1 per cent.

The average income of families headed by women in 1985 was $19,205, whereas the income of families headed by men was $40,697. In 1985, 56 per cent of unattached women had pre-school children and 69 per cent of unattached women whose youngest child was between the ages of 6 and 15 were working. The total number of children looked after by child care services rose by 70 per cent between 1977 and 1983. But we still have a long way to go, and I am pleased that the government is ready to initiate discussions with labour and business on child care, following the recommendations of the committee's report on child care.

I am sorry that Senator Hastings is not in the chamber this afternoon, because, when I was preparing my notes for my speech today, I could not help but insert a comment about the requirement for early intervention where children are abused emotionally and physically in what one calls a home environment. If we are honest with ourselves, we accept the fact that common law is biased toward the parent. It is not biased toward the child. A child can be treated in whatever way the parent wants to treat that child. Certainly, provinces have legislation, but, generally speaking, many of the children fall through the cracks. I believe that as we press for a national day care service, we must also press for early intervention where there is a requirement on parents, if they are to keep their children, to receive some parenting skills. We should not have a social worker come in, grab the children one day, keep them out for three months, put them back in again, and then bring them out again and put them back in again. The revolving door does not exist only in the prisons; it exists in foster-parenting, and it is a disgrace in this country, an absolute disgrace.

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators, I really believe that we have to demand that we do a better job there.

I will explain further why I wish Senator Hastings were present in the chamber. During the summer I had a young, bright law student in my office, because my regular staff was on education leave. As a summer project for that young man, I asked him to search through the legal system, through the penitentiary system, and research the data which would show where those mandatory supervision cases came from. I wanted him to find out what happened to them when they were three years or four years old, and where they came from.

Honourable senators, there is no research in Canada. After two and a half months on that project, I can tell honourable senators that there is no research. What have we been doing? What has the Justice Department, the Attorney General's Department or the Parole Board been doing? We are going to perpetuate this problem. We should be more concerned not with mandatory supervision but with preventing the problem.

Senator Frith: Violence in society!

Senator Robertson: We should make a start. We should get them early; and if parents cannot give them a good environment, then, as a society, we should do so. I do not have to tell honourable senators that there is no talent in creating a child. We all know what the Humane Society would do if it saw animals in the community being treated in the way that some of our children are being treated. It is time that we stopped talking about it and started doing something about it. I am very concerned about this matter, and I do not like the way that foster parents are used, how the children are brought in and the parents have a holiday. The children go back and forth, and it is just ridiculous. Perhaps I will have a chance to return to that subject another time.

I am pleased that our national priority will continue to remove barriers that keep women from participating fully in the workplace. We are making progress. We have not done enough, but we will get there.

Women with a university degree—and I am sure that the women in this chamber know this—on average earn only as much as men with a high school education. Yet, they are forced to carry the burden of domestic responsibilities. Usually, they work 40 hours a week with very little compensation from the tax system. According to Statistics Canada, the value of unpaid work in 1986 is estimated to be $160 billion. Only 25 per cent of all families are supported by the husband alone. In the absence of the support payments, many dependent spouses and children, of course, are forced on to welfare. It is estimated that Canadian taxpayers spend $1 billion annually to support dependent spouses and their children. However, between 75 per cent and 85 per cent of the support and maintenance payments are breached either in whole or in part. This occurs even though 80 per cent of the supporting spouses are able to afford their payments. If it is out of your pocket, it is out of the citizens of Canada's pocket, and it should not go on! I am pleased that our government is recognizing this problem.

The growing instance of sexual assault against women has risen still further. Current statistics show that there have been 453 cases of aggravated sexual assault, 805 cases of sexual assault with a weapon, and 16,900 cases of sexual assault. Given that we know that most cases are never reported, these figures are all the more alarming. It is important that the Throne Speech has promised tougher legislation in this regard.

Our government has made major reforms to pension plans, but much work needs to be done before we have adequate pensions for homemakers.

The government's commitment to the fight against drug abuse is a most important commitment. Families, both young and old, are being torn apart by those who traffic illegally in drugs and by those who indulge in personal abuse. I think that we have been complacent too long. We sit back and say, "It is not going to happen to us," though it is happening all around us. Sometimes it does happen to us. We really have not created that much of a commotion about the matter. I am pleased with what I have seen in the international arena where, increasingly, more countries are concerned about this problem. I believe that we are on the right track.

Our government has promised tougher initiatives in the problem of missing children. To date there are 910 reported cases, 331 of which are in contravention of custody orders. I could go on and on, but, like everybody else, I watch the clock, too.

I am pleased with the comments in the Throne Speech about social justice, and I am sure that members of this chamber will make a major contribution in our efforts to solve, or at least lessen, the many social problems that Canadian citizens face. They are depending on government, depending on people like you and me to do something constructive, not to sit back and wait. In many of these areas, I do not think that we can wait much longer.

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marshall calling the attention of the Senate to the Interim Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries, tabled in the Senate on 2nd October, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Molgat, I move adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

JOINT COMMITTEE—SENATE MEMBERS—MESSAGE TO COMMONS

The Senate proceeded to consideration of a message from the House of Commons requesting the Senate to unite with that House in the formation of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Honourable Senators Asselin, Guay, Robichaud, Rousseau, Simard, Tremblay and Wood have been appointed to act on behalf of the Senate as Members of the Joint Committee of both Houses on Official Languages, Policy and Programs.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before we go to the next order, and just for the sake of those thousands of scholars across this land who pay scrupulous attention to procedural questions in the Senate, I think we should have something on the record to explain that the message that was sent to us by the House of Commons was that we should unite in the formation of the standing joint committee. Our response is not to unite but to tell them what senators we are appointing to serve on the joint committee. The reason is that the message from the House of Commons is really inappropriate because the committee is a standing joint committee, which is provided for in the rules, and, therefore, we are not required to unite in the establishment of the committee, as we would be if it were a special committee. In this way, we are quietly telling the other place who our members are rather than trying to unravel the whole thing and start with a different message. My comments also apply to Order No. 7. Senator Doody and I have discussed this matter and he is aware of the point I am making. I am not calling him to order on it.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY CONGRATULATIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I ask leave to make a few comments about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and to express a few words of congratulation to the corporation on its fiftieth anniversary.

First, I should declare an interest or a bias that will soon become apparent from my comments. The CBC won my heart very early in life for other than purely altruistic reasons. The CBC as it is now took over from the CRBC, the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Corporation—as Allan McFee still calls the CBC—in 1936. It was only two years later in 1937 or 1938 that I first performed on the CBC. At the time I was at Parkdale Collegiate where Dr. Leslie Bell was the music teacher. At the time I was in either the first or second form and had the pleasure of singing in a choir under his leadership. I believe the headquarters of the CBC, if I remember correctly, was at the old Eddy Battery Factory at the corner of Davenport and Bathurst in Toronto, where the TTC marshalling yard was then located. We did a program every Saturday night for 13 weeks—which was always the life of a series.

Senator Phillips: And you've been ringing bells ever since.

Senator Frith: Thank you, senator. I will take that as a compliment. The rarest of compliments in this direction are from you.

Senator Doody: I would examine it closely before I accepted it.

Senator Frith: I do not intend to examine it closely. I will take it as said.

Anyway, from that time on I had a program of some kind on the CBC, almost right through high school and university.

I suppose I was what would be called a "studio singer," in that I was on the list of basses, and often when an opera was presented or there was some special performance, I would get a call.

As a result—and this is where the lack of altruism comes in—the CBC, in addition to giving me a free musical education and many lifelong musical and other friends, actually helped me get through law school; and even during my early days of practice I was active with the corporation. I remember all of the heroes of the day, including Andrew Allen. I often sang on programs that he produced in the famous "Stage" series. Also, I was a charter member of the Festival Singers, and at one time Elmer Eisler called me after I became a lawyer. I had been practising law for some time and thought that I no longer needed benefits from music. He told me that the CBC was giving an eightieth birthday party for Igor Stravinsky and they planned to sing a composition of his called "A Symphony of Psalms", which, in those days, was considered a reasonably difficult piece. However, I knew it and he asked me whether I would like to sing. I said no, that I would be too busy, that I would be in court that day and would not be able to make the rehearsals. He said, "Well, that's too bad, because Stravinsky is going to conduct." So I quickly got out of the court cases, and I had the pleasure of singing for Igor Stravinsky.

Those are the kinds of things that I hope make it clear why I wish to say something favourable about the CBC, because it has played an enormous role in my life. I believe it has also played an enormous role in the life of this country. Northrup Frye sees it as that string which holds the pearls together. It is very difficult to thread pearls unless one does it one at a time, rather than having them all on a table and trying to run a thread through them.

Someone has described this country as a sort of archipelago rather than a land mass. When one flies over it at night, it looks rather like an archipelago, with long gaps of black and then some light to illuminate what would be an archipelago in a sea.

The CBC has also played a very important role in this country's life. Certainly, CBC Radio, in any event—although I have some experience with CBC Television, I don't watch television as much as I would like to—has played a crucial role in holding this country together and might justifiably be described as the most important unifying force in this country's life and history.

So I want to record in our journals, for both the personal reasons that I have mentioned and for reasons that I think are of more general application, my wish for a happy fiftieth birthday to the CBC. Unless I live to be 113 years old, I won't be here for the hundredth, but I hope the CBC will.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Le Moynes: Honourable senators, I shall, if I may, add my comments to those made by Senator Frith. As for the notes I have here, one look should convince you that improvisation is the order of the day.

Honourable senators, I wish to salute the CBC on its fiftieth anniversary, and I would like to expand very briefly on one aspect of the influence it had on the generation that grew up with its initial programming.

At the time I belonged to a group of young intellectuals whose interests in the humanities went far beyond the strictly literary. We had a passion for music, and in the course of our erratic and lengthy initiation to its pleasures, the truly distinguished broadcasts by Radio-Canada played a very important role. They acquainted us with those classic luminaries: Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner and other great composers, and with the art of Toscanini, Walter, Melchior, Flagstad and Lotte Lehman.

We listened to the concerts transmitted by Radio-Canada with almost religious fervor, and it was these concerts and operas that set the standard for our appreciation of the classics.

Later, after La Relève, which we founded in 1934, came Cité Libre, where several members of our group were welcomed as collaborators and friends. The atmosphere was different, but we still had a sense of continuity.

Through the good offices of members of Cité Libre and mainly thanks to Roger Rolland, the admirable professor of literature, critic and very dear friend, director of Radio Collège at the time, Radio-Canada gave me a second initiation into the mysteries of facing the public as a writer and as a speaker who has to consider his audience. An invaluable experience for the writer, who is so easily inclined to think he has conjured up all there is to know about reality in his study.

With these memories of a feast of intellectual riches, I want to praise the government of this country which at the time so brilliantly fulfilled its cultural role. Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am not presuming to speak for my party—I am far from being musical enough to get into the act on this one—but I would like to add a little postscript in the realm of correctitude. Strictly speaking, this idea of the fiftieth anniversary is not really on all fours with history. More properly, the CBC was born not in 1936 but was the creation of the Right Honourable R.B. Bennett some years earlier. All the ills, ill fame and glories that stem therefrom should appropriately be placed before the name of that man who, with all the difficulties from 1930 to 1935—it must have been the worst time to run this country—had time for that great inspiration, the Canadian Radio Commission, out of which there came the CBC.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Daniel Hays: Honourable senators, I would like to take a moment to join with my colleagues in expressing best wishes to the CBC on this occasion. Whether it is precisely its anniversary or not is of no account—and in connection with Senator Macquarrie's comments, thank you, R.B. Bennett.

I had the privilege, and sometimes the pleasure, of serving on the CBC board from 1979 to 1984, and I came to know it very well during that time. All of us and all Canadians can take justifiable pride in what the CBC has accomplished to date. I think all of us should be sensitive to and aware of the problems that the CBC faces in its future. I very much hope that fifty years from now we will all still be as proud as we are justified in being of the past fifty years. If this is to be the case, we as legislators and as Canadians generally should become much more aware of the CBC in its broadcasting and in its other manifestations such as publishing and so on, and much more aware of its problems. To the extent that we do that, I think that its future will be secure.

Be that as it may, the CBC is a great national institution that has played an extremely important role in our country and in the unity of our country, and I am convinced it still has a very important role to play. The CBC is never very much beyond or above controversy. In fact, it is frequently the source of controversy. We can all recall quite vigorous condemnations that were made of the CBC or of parts of the CBC in the past by personages as eminent as the Prime Minister of Canada and Ministers of the Crown, in respect of public affairs broadcasting. Latterly, we have had the understandable tensions that arise when a government, at a time of fiscal restraint, is obliged to include a crown corporation as important as the CBC within those fiscal restraints. Those tensions and those controversies are always going to arise. What is important, I think, is that we maintain the important concept of public broadcasting, namely, the autonomy of the CBC, and that we do everything we can as parliamentarians, as legislators and as ministers to support the essential work of the CBC in maintaining the unity of our country.

[Translation]

Our colleague, Senator Le Moynes, gave a very eloquent account of the role played by Radio-Canada in the cultural life of this country.

It would be hard to underestimate the vital role Radio-Canada has played in increasing the awareness of the francophone community, not only in Quebec but across the country, of the culture and cultural manifestations of the Canadian francophonie.

[English]

I am very pleased, on behalf of the government, to thank the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and the other honourable senators who have participated in this brief discussion today, and to salute the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on fifty years of solid achievement for strengthening the unity of our country.

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I, too, would like to add my voice to those congratulating the CBC. I recall my early days in London, Ontario, watching the CBC and believing that this was our opportunity, in that small town, to sense a larger vision of the country. I think it is also appropriate to recall today the great work done in support of the CBC by the late Graham Spry, who was a wonderful inspiration to many young and old Canadians and who, at all times, was a staunch defender and supporter of the CBC.

The CBC has been a national house—a national house without walls, an electric house of dreams and hopes. But in recent days these hopes and dreams seem to have faltered as one signal and one channel has had to compete with many signals and many channels. I hope that in the years ahead, during the lifetime of the deputy leader and many of us in this chamber, we will yet have an opportunity to see this corporation launch CBC 2, an all-Canadian channel with all-Canadian content, so that our citizens and children can have the opportunity to see a reflection of the country that is pure, natural and indigenous. Rather than diverting itself to American programs, perhaps the CBC can return to its original promise to provide to Canadians something they cannot get elsewhere; that something is a 24 hour-a-day channel, coast-to-coast Canadian voice and Canadian vision.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I move that this report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, if I might take a moment, I should like to be informed of what the Honourable Senator Molgat is proposing here.

Is it a change in numbers and, if so, what is the aim of the exercise? Could the honourable senator tell me the particular rule so that I can look it up?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I had proposed that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate so that I could explain to honourable senators what it is the committee is reporting on and why. I am prepared to do so now, with leave of the Senate, if that is the wish of the Senate, or I can do so at the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Roblin: I must have misunderstood my friend's motion; I thought he intended to deal with it now. If it is to be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate, that suits me very well.

THAT the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to continue the study undertaken in 1985-86 on the Consultation Paper on Child and Elderly Benefits, issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare, tabled in the Senate on the 5th February, 1985, and to report thereon;

THAT the Committee present its report no later than Tuesday, 22nd December 1987.

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources have the power to sit at three o'clock in the afternoon tomorrow, Wednesday, November 5, 1986 even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Frith: Explain!

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, the purpose of the motion is to facilitate the work of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee which at the moment has under consideration the subject matter of Bill C-5 and Bill C-6. We are seeking permission to sit tomorrow at three o'clock to facilitate the appearance before the committee of a very important witness from western Canada who will be available at that time.

INTERNATIONAL FINANCIAL SYSTEM AND INSTITUTIONS

CANADA'S PARTICIPATION—FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO CONTINUE STUDY

Hon. George van Roggen, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be empowered to examine and report on Canada's participation in the international financial system and institutions and in particular the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank Group and the regional development banks, including the debt repayment problems of developing countries;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject before the Committee during the First Session of the Thirty-third Parliament be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee report no later than March 31, 1987.

Senator Frith: Explain.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, if I were seeking a new reference for the committee at this time, I would not presume to ask for leave but, rather, I would give notice. However, this reference is word for word the same as the reference the committee had in the previous Parliament. For all intents and purposes, we have finished hearing witnesses. We are in the midst of drafting the report, and it is simply our desire to continue the reference we had in the hopes of having the report completed, at least for the printers, by the Christmas recess.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES, POLICY AND PROGRAMS

JOINT COMMITTEE—AUTHORIZATION TO MEET DURING SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENTS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, Policy and Programs have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Honourable Senator Doody what the purpose of the motion is at this time. I understand that the House of Commons intends to change the name of that committee and has asked us to join with them in the matter. In fact, that was the purpose of our report earlier, unless I have mistaken the name of the committee to which Senator Doody is referring.

Senator Doody: The purpose is simply as stated. It gives leave for the committee to sit during sittings of the Senate. I think that what Senator Molgat is asking is why I did not wait until the name had been changed. I had intended to do that. As a matter of fact, if His Honour will look at the document, he will see that part of it has already been scratched out and mutilated in anticipation of Senator Molgat's motion going through today. When it did not go through, I simply reverted to the old form. The purpose of the motion is simply to allow the committee to sit while the Senate is sitting.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

EQUALITY OF TREATMENT OF PROVINCES—EFFECT OF AWARDING OF CF-18 CONTRACT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Premier Pawley of Manitoba, after meeting with the Prime Minister, has publicly declared that he will not discuss constitutional matters until he is satisfied that small provinces will be treated fairly by the federal government.

Considering the Leader of the Government's portfolio responsibility, can he tell us whether the discussions about constitutional amendment to persuade Quebec to sign the constitutional accord will, therefore, be suspended until Premier Pawley is so satisfied?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, we are not at the stage of launching formal negotiations in any case. When that time comes, I hope and expect that Manitoba, together with the other nine provinces and the federal government, will be ready to participate.

Senator Frith: Is that expectation based on the belief that Premier Pawley, by that time, will be satisfied that small provinces will be treated fairly by the federal government?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, upon reflection, I think any reasonable person would agree that small provinces and all provinces are treated fairly by the federal government, but my expectation that Manitoba will want to participate in any discussions or negotiations aimed at bringing about Quebec's consent to a constitutional accord is based on the fact that it is manifestly in the interests of all of Canada that that be done. I am including the western provinces which have constitutional proposals of their own, which would be very difficult to realize if one of the majors were not at the table.

Senator Frith: Is it reasonable to take it from that answer that the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations feels that Premier Pawley is either not reflective, not reasonable or both?

● (1430)

Senator Murray: I would remind honourable senators—and I believe that Premier Pawley on reflection would agree—that on August 12 last in Edmonton he and nine other premiers agreed that their first constitutional priority was to have Quebec consent to a constitutional accord. In that respect they agreed to continue discussions based on the five conditions already put forward by Quebec; that they would not, during that first round, bring in other constitutional proposals; and, specifically, that they would not attempt to make any linkage between that aim and the inevitable problems that arise from day to day in the management of the federation.

Senator Frith: Premier Pawley is making such a linkage now.

Senator Murray: But, as I say, I believe that Premier Pawley, on reflection, would agree that it is in the interests of the whole of the country, including Manitoba and the western provinces, that we do everything we can to obtain Quebec's consent to a constitutional accord.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government, but it is on another subject.

Perhaps other honourable senators may wish to ask questions arising out of the CF-18 contract.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, perhaps I might pursue the line of questioning raised by Senator Frith. The Leader of the Government, in his reply, said that the provinces had agreed last August to certain conditions and that there would be no linkages; also that he did not expect that the Premier of Manitoba would change the course of the discussion. However, in light of the contract which has given rise to this question, the government did change the rules through a change in the tendering process. Part way through the government changed the rules. Would it not be acceptable for Premier Pawley to change his position from that of August?

Senator Murray: I regret very much that the honourable senator is associating himself with the linkage that has been made in a moment of controversy by the Premier of Manitoba between the constitutional dossier and the question of the service contract for the CF-18. The fact of the matter is that the government has changed no rules in this matter. We respected the procedures, and the honourable senator will be aware that on such tender calls it is almost always stipulated that the lowest or any tender is not necessarily accepted.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I will not at this point engage in a debate, but there is no question but that the rules were changed by the federal government.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator Molgat: However, I should like to pursue further questions on the subject of the contract. I wonder if the Leader of the Government agrees with some of the views that have been expressed, particularly that expressed by his predecessor, Senator Roblin, who stated: "I am very disappointed with the government."

Senator Frith: Hear, hear! That is the chorus to join.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am sure that all honourable senators and members of Parliament from Manitoba are disappointed with the outcome.

An Hon. Senator: Right on!

Senator Murray: Senator Roblin and others can, of course, speak for themselves about the process. I am sure they would have preferred to see the contract go to the firm based in Manitoba.

Senator Frith: On reflection, does Senator Roblin have anything to add?

Senator Molgat: The Leader of the Government has changed the wording of my question. I was not asking whether they were disappointed in the process. I quoted Senator Roblin, who said: "I am very disappointed with the government." That is the question. Does the Leader of the Government agree?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am not disappointed at all with the government.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: Oh! There is tomorrow's headline!

Senator Argue: A fighter for the maritimes!

INDUSTRY

FOREIGN FIRMS BIDDING ON CONTRACTS IN CANADA— GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Can the Leader of the Government tell us what is the policy of the government with regard to foreign firms, or so-called foreign firms, bidding on contracts in Canada?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): There has been no change in the policy of the government in that regard.

Senator Frith: Then let us hear what it was, so that we will know it wasn't changed. What is the policy that has not been changed?

Senator Molgat: Are firms in Canada, whether they are owned by foreign companies or Canadian companies, treated equally when bidding on Canadian contracts?

Senator Murray: Yes, honourable senators.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I am sure that many of us will not forget the comment made by the Prime Minister after the election. When he visited the United States and was in Washington he said, "We are now open for business." I repeat, "We are open for business." The policy with regard to the CF-18 is slightly different. If I heard the minister correctly, the Honourable Robert de Cotret outlined the fact that he did not want a contract going to a firm whose base was in another country. That is contrary to what the Prime Minister said during his visit to Washington shortly after the election. I should like to know which statement is correct, that of the Prime Minister when he visited the United States or that of the Honourable Robert de Cotret when he said that he would rather give it to a Canadian-owned firm than to an outside firm.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the determining factor was not so much the ownership of the company in question, rather, it was the fact that one company is a manufacturer of aircraft and the other is not.

Senator Molgat: The Leader of the Government has just said, "not so much the ownership," which indicates that it was, at least, part of the reason. Can he reply clearly? Was the fact that Bristol Aerospace Ltd. has some foreign ownership a factor, yes or no?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I have just said, the determining factor with regard to the technology transfer was not ownership but, rather, the fact that one company is a manufacturer of aircraft and the other is not.

Senator Molgat: In other words, the statements by the Honourable Robert de Cotret and the Prime Minister about the ownership of the company had nothing to do with the contract. They were incorrect in their statements?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have answered the question.

Senator Olson: No, you have not.

Senator Frith: Let the record show that he has not.

Senator Guay: Did I hear the Leader of the Government say that he would answer the question, but that there is a little waiting period?

Senator Murray: I said that I have answered the question.

Senator Guay: The Leader of the Government has left some doubt in our minds as to whether he did or not. He might believe that in his estimation he has, but there is a lot of room for us to think differently. The Leader of the Government made the statement that the contract was awarded to a company that is manufacturing aircraft. I have no disagreement with him on that. But he must bear in mind that Bristol has all of the equipment to look after the tender as submitted to the government and it could very ably do the work it was called upon to do. Why then does the Leader of the Government say that one is a company that manufactures aircraft and the other does not? It has nothing to do with what we are talking about.

Senator Murray: Because, honourable senators, that is a fact. My honourable friend is raising debating points, and I would invite him to debate them at the appropriate time; and someone will speak on the matter on behalf of the government.

AEROSPACE—AWARDING OF CF-18 SERVICE CONTRACT TO CANADAIR—TECHNOLOGY TRANSFER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question about the technology transfer. It is something that the Leader of the Government might wish to take some time to answer, or perhaps he will provide some detail for us. Can he explain to us specifically what are the advantages regarding the technology transfer of what I believe most people assume would be something available in the repair manuals of the company that originally manufactured the aircraft? It is an off-the-shelf aircraft. Can the Leader of the Government give us some detail of what the technological advantages would be in the transfer, by telling us what the transfers would be and why they would be so much more advantageous by being given to Canadair—apart from the company being manufacturers and domestically owned—than to Bristol Aerospace Ltd.?

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government on the same matter. The subject of the technology transfer was thought of only recently and was not part of the original tender terms. If it had been, a company such as Bristol Aerospace Ltd. might have said, "Well, we do not manufacture aircraft. The other people do. We should not go to the expense of bidding." In view of the fact that this did not form part of the original tender documents and that Bristol is reputed to have won on points at that stage, is the government considering reimbursing Bristol for the $5 million it spent in working up this pointless bid that it put in?

An Hon. Senator: Good question!

Senator Frith: Good point!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I don't accept the premise of the honourable senator's question, but this is a matter that came up much later. I may say that the request for proposals had indicated that proposals would be evaluated, and I quote:

... to the extent of giving consideration to socio-economic benefits that will include such terms as Canadian design, development and Canadian manufacturing, engineering and support personnel that will be used by the contractor.

In this context both Minister McInnes and, later, Minister Vézina, along with the Minister of DRIE, were concerned to maximize the socio-economic benefits and the nature of technology transfer to consolidate and strengthen the Canadian aerospace industry. As a result, both Minister McInnes and, later, Minister Vézina made submissions to the Treasury Board recommending Canadair of Montreal.

Senator van Roggen: And does that answer, honourable senator, suggest that the 75 assessment officers were not following the terms of the bid properly?

Senator Murray: I am suggesting, honourable senators, that with regard to both technical evaluation and price, the companies were close enough that it would be quite understandable that the government would make a judgment call.

AEROSPACE—AWARDING OF CF-18 SERVICE CONTRACT—REJECTION OF IMP BID—GOVERNMENT REASONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. There was a third company involved in the bidding, IMP of Nova Scotia. My concern is the huge amounts of money that are invested by a company, with good reason, believing that the rules established for the bidding procedure at the beginning will be the same rules to be applied at the end. Apparently, in this particular situation, the rules were changed. I am wondering at what point in time it was determined that IMP lacked the expertise to be a serious bidder; on what facts the determination was based; at what point in time did the government determine the competence or the incompetence or the inadequacy of the IMP bid; and when was IMP advised that they were not in the picture?

senators, I have some partial information in answer to those questions, and I think I should obtain complete information. I am informed that IMP did not make the finals. Their bid was considered unacceptable, based on technical non-compliance. When I asked for more details on that today, I was told that they could not be released at the moment because the company itself has not yet been debriefed. However, I shall see what further information is available this week and report to the honourable senator.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—DEFINITION OF “NATIONAL TREATMENT”

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, last week I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate about the current bilateral trade negotiations with the United States, and he advised us that the government had no secret plan, no contingent plan, as yet made public, defining conditions of retreat or withdrawal, assuming the fast-track negotiations are not completed early next year.

In light of that statement, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to assist the Senate in advising us what the Prime Minister meant in his address to the nation regarding these comprehensive bilateral trade negotiations with the United States when he stated:

We will seek, what in the jargon of trade negotiators is called, national treatment.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise what the Prime Minister meant when he said that the theory of “national treatment” would be the motivating principle behind the negotiations with the United States?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, there is a definition of “national treatment” that is best known to trade negotiators, and I would not try to extemporize, or improvise, on the concept at the moment. I will obtain a proper definition for the honourable senator and bring it in tomorrow.

Senator Grafstein: Would the leader, when he is seeking that definition, advise us whether or not under that definition the Auto Pact would be redundant, and all the mechanisms we have established by legislation and regulation to preserve Canadian content, such as Bill C-58, and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, would also be redundant?

CORRECTIONS

EFFECT OF PRIVATIZATION AND REDUCED SERVICES

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and it pertains to the initiative by the Government of Canada, through the Corrections Service of Canada, operating to the detriment and erosion of the National Parole Service. I am referring to the privatization initiative. I am asking this in light of the fact that Montgomery Centre in the city of Toronto was turned over yesterday to a private organization by the name of Springboard. Up until now it has been operated by the Corrections Service of Canada, but it has been turned over to a private organization. Direct parole supervision in the city of Toronto is also to be turned over to private organizations. This follows an initiative, honourable senators, in the province of Alberta, where parole supervision and the operation of community correction centres were turned over to the province, and parole supervision is now undertaken by the provincial probation services.

My question to the Leader of the Government is: Is it the intention of the government, through the Corrections Service of Canada, to continue this “provincialization” and privatization of the National Parole Service—this attack on the Public Service of Canada—to the detriment and the destruction of this service?

Meanwhile, I do suggest very sincerely that what the honourable senator has stated is the subject matter for debate. The Throne Speech debate is still on our order paper and I suggest that he take an early opportunity to participate in it. I will do what I can to have a colleague speak for the government on the whole range of issues that the honourable senator wishes to treat.

Senator Hastings: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. When he consults his colleague, will he undertake to find out if this is another indication of reduced services in other parts of Canada for the benefit of the Port-Cartier Institution? In other words, decrease person-years, decrease expenditures in the other parts of Canada to cover that $41 million waste on an unwanted, unneeded institution.

Senator Frith: He fully intended to do that.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I regret very much that the honourable senator should associate himself with some of the divisive and quite destructive things that are being said in the country lately.

Senator Argue: Like moving penitentiaries.

Senator Frith: And some of the divisive things that are being done, not just being said.

Senator Murray: I would hope that he would agree that socio-economic considerations are worthy—

Senator Frith: Try not to smile when you say that.

Senator Murray: —of being considered when locating federal institutions in this country. As I told him the other day, I do not believe, and the government does not believe, that correctional institutions should be located near places simply to suit the convenience of psychiatrists, psychologists and social workers.

Senator Frith: Or Prime Ministers!

Senator Murray: That may meet their convenience, but it is no way to build a country.

Senator Hastings: I am not joining the divisive forces with respect to this issue, I am joining the Auditor General of Canada, who said it was unneeded; it could not be justified as to need. Now, I do not think that the Auditor General is joining those divisive forces.

While you are talking to your colleague, would you undertake to ask him if the severance package that was offered to parole officers to leave the public service has now been rejected by the Treasury Board? In other words, the Corrections Service of Canada made an offer to parole officers who accepted it in good faith, and now the Government of Canada can't deliver it.

Senator Murray: That is a reasonably factual question; I will see if I can bring back a factual answer. Meanwhile, I do invite the honourable senator to raise these matters in debate at the first opportunity.

THE MINISTRY

ROLE OF DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. John. B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates to the evolution of the office of the Deputy Prime Minister. If the Leader of the Government in the Senate did not devote all of his day on Saturday to listening to the CBC, he may have seen a story in the Globe and Mail headlined: "Mulroney's Office gets the White House Look." I will not go into that, but the story said that the present Deputy Prime Minister had been given new and more adequate accommodation; yet it indicated that he does not have the specific responsibilities that his predecessor in office had.

● (1450)

My question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Have new functions been defined which have been assigned to the Deputy Prime Minister, or has the Prime Minister himself delegated any of his many functions to the Deputy Prime Minister? I am trying to ascertain, honourable senators, whether or not the office of the Deputy Prime Minister is fast becoming a new, distinct and important element in the ministerial structure.

INDUSTRY

AEROSPACE—AWARDING OF CF-18 SERVICE CONTRACT TO CANADAIR—POSSIBLE UNDERTAKING TO BOMBARDIER

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have a further question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to the CF-18 contract. I must apologize. I thought that Senator Grafstein's question was on the same subject, but it turned out that he changed the subject.

My second question was this: Did the government give any undertaking whatsoever, implied or otherwise, to Bombardier before they purchased Canadair from CDC that this contract would be given to them regardless of the outcome of the technical assessment of the experts?

ENERGY

PRICE OF CANADIAN GAS TO U.S. CONSUMERS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I understand that as a result of government policy U.S. consumers will be able to obtain Canadian gas more cheaply than will Canadians. Is that true?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, there was a fairly comprehensive statement made within the last few days by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on that point, which is as follows:

The principle that Canadian gas will not be sold in export markets for less than comparable prices in the domestic market can, I believe, be upheld but implemented with a flexibility appropriate to a less-regulated market.

In the new environment, where producers will seek the best deals for their gas in either U.S. or Canadian markets, the possibility of this principle being broken is greatly reduced. If the American market becomes even more competitive and prices drop, we can expect the same situation to be occurring in the Canadian market, as buyers exercise their new negotiating powers.

The minister then goes on to say:

It is no longer reasonable to expect regulators to approve export prices before a sale is allowed, when domestic prices will fluctuate with market trends. To do so would place unnecessary burdens on both the NEB and the industry and would result in unproductive and damaging delays in the approval of applications.

He says further:

We can and will, however, carefully monitor domestic and export prices to ensure that Canadians are not placed at a disadvantage. If experience shows that the Canadian market is not working as expected, we will take rapid corrective action.

Senator Frith: May I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate, as a former chairman of the campaign committee of the party to which he belongs, is he or is he not happy that, in the last election campaign, what was promised by the Prime Minister was that Canadian consumers will never pay more than American consumers. Is he happy that that was said in the campaign rather than what he has just told us?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we do not think that they will.

Senator Frith: Is that what that statement purports to say?

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Frith: I would like to inquire further about this matter after I study that.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to one question this afternoon. Once again, if any senator wishes, I will read the answer, otherwise I will ask that it be taken as read.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 30 last by the Honourable Senator Marsden regarding Research and Development—National Research Council Funding—Government Policy.

(The answer follows:)

The government has not yet made a decision as to the location of the new Canadian Space Agency. It must be remembered that there are many factors to be considered in the formation of the new agency in order to ensure that it is set up in a manner that is most effective at managing those aspects of Canada's space program for which it will be responsible. At the present time there are detailed discussions taking place to define the exact nature and structure of the new agency. Many of the factors that must be considered, like the relationship of the agency to the government, its precise mandate and the location of existing space facilities, will affect the decision as to where to best locate the agency. For example, the existing facilities are not co-located and would be expensive to move; therefore, consideration must be given to leaving them in place versus consolidating them in one location.

It should be noted however, that over 75 per cent of the money spent by the government on space programs goes to Canadian industry by the regular contracting out process. Therefore, the location of the agency does not affect where the benefits of the space program will be generated.

The government has just completed a series of four meetings across the country in which federal officials began discussions with their provincial counterparts to determine ways of improving the regional distribution of space program spending. The provincial governments have shown a good deal of interest in having their industry participate in the leading edge technologies required for the space program. But, again, one will note that it is the intent of the government to spread these benefits across the country and, therefore, the location of the agency will not have any significant economic impact in and of itself.

CANADA PETROLEUM RESOURCES BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Barootes, seconded by the Honourable Senator David, for the second reading of Bill C-5, An Act to regulate interests in petroleum in relation to frontier lands, to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and to repeal the Canada Oil and Gas Act.—(Honourable Senator Hastings).

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I welcome this opportunity of participating in the debate on Bill C-5. Before commencing, I wonder if I might ask the mover of the bill whether it is his intention to refer this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources on second reading. He did not indicate in his speech whether or not such was his intention.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, it is our intention to so refer the bill, if it is the wish of the Senate.

Senator Hastings: My first words must be words of apology to my dear friend and associate, Senator Barootes from Saskatchewan, for my absence at the time he made his presentation on this bill. He knows how much I, almost always, value his sage advice and how much I regretted missing his presentation here in the Senate. However, I want to assure him that I read it very carefully and found it interesting—but not very enlightening when it comes to energy policy in Canada.

I notice that he said in his speech that he was bringing a ray of sunshine to the Senate in respect of the discussion of energy policy. I do not know whether or not he succeeded, but I doubt very much that his contribution would impress those senators from the Northwest Territories or the Yukon, or those senators from the maritimes. Certainly, I doubt very much whether senators from the producing provinces such as Alberta and Saskatchewan would be enthralled with his contribution. However, if he did succeed, I would suggest that he send a copy of that speech to the people of Red Deer, Alberta, for instance. I am sure that they would be enthralled to hear that we now have a framework set up by this government. It was in Red Deer that the present Prime Minister, in July of 1984, promised 300,000 jobs to the industry. All they had to do was elect the Conservative government and, upon that government taking office, there would be 300,000 jobs in the industry. Honourable senators, what is the result? We have 55,000 unemployed this winter in the industry in Alberta. But we have a framework, and I am sure that, as I say, those unemployed people will be enthralled to know of this great framework that has been established instead of jobs.

Senator Barootes might also send a copy of his speech to the editor of the Edmonton Journal, that great supporter of conservatism in Alberta, because he needs a little ray of sunshine in his thinking with respect to energy policy in Canada. In a recent editorial, he wrote:

● (1500)

There's only one catastrophe worse than the slump in Canada's oil and gas industry and that's the performance of Marcel Masse as federal energy minister.

This is the man, honourable senators, who has stood guard over the bastion of Toryism in Alberta for years.

Recently, Masse made the preposterous claim that the energy industry is not a job-creation sector. Then he broke one of Brian Mulroney's sacred election promises by placing Canada's goal of energy self-sufficiency on hold.

Now, after finally acknowledging that the "situation in Alberta is a catastrophe," he offers nothing but paternalistic smarm to comfort the 55,000 Albertans who stand to lose their jobs this winter.

Masse's response is not just "any response"; it's no response.

...

Helping the oil and gas industry in Alberta may not be a priority in Central Canada, but it is vital to the nation's future. Self-sufficiency must be a long-term goal; it cannot be pursued and abandoned on whims.

Ottawa must provide assistance to the energy industry when it is needed—not when it suits Masse to do so.

He will be interested in a ray of sunshine, honourable senators—this man who was, as I have said, the guardian of Toryism in Alberta.

He might send a copy of his speech to the mayors of Tuktoyaktuk and Inuvik, where unemployment is ravaging those communities. We can tell them, honourable senators, that although there will be no development and no work, we have a cornerstone—we are using this window of opportunity to put forth a cornerstone. There are no jobs, but there is a cornerstone to failure.

He could send a copy of his speech to the workers at Halifax, where the rigs stand idle in the harbour. They will appreciate a ray of sunshine when 2,400 out of 3,600 have lost their jobs. They will be thrilled to hear that we are committing to an energy policy subject to the vagaries of the free market, as is extolled by the Conservative government.

Senator Barootes is quite correct when he says that this bill has the support of the Canadian Petroleum Association. But those of us on the energy committee have learned from our most recent and from past studies that the Canadian Petroleum Association does not necessarily represent the views of the vast majority of the industry.

The Canadian Petroleum Association expressed no very strong concern with respect to Bill C-5. There has, however, been criticism directed at this bill—directed not at what it says but at what it does not say. It does not promote development in the Atlantic Canada business community. It does not encourage ocean research and development, which are emerging in the maritime region. It is faulted for the lack of the consultative process. Honourable senators, this was the government that was to consult everyone. All would be happy and all would be consulted. The very people in the maritime provinces who work in the trenches, as they have said to us, have not been consulted. I mention these things because there has indeed been dissatisfaction expressed, honourable senators, with Bill C-5. That dissatisfaction is being expressed in the very region that is supposed to benefit from this legislation.

Mr. John F. Smith, the Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Offshore Trade Association of Nova Scotia, told us that there are some basic flaws in the foundation of the present policies that give rise to concern about meaningful development of the east coast resources. He was concerned that the ground on which energy self-sufficiency policies are to be based is uncertain because there is not enough focus on Canadian oil and gas as a continuing energy source, nor is there the sense of urgency required to address the industry's problems. Our answer to his concerns is Bill C-5, which relegates Canadian self-sufficiency to the marketplace and to the vagaries of a foreign cartel.

Honourable senators, these are the people who are to benefit from this government's policies; these are the people who were to be consulted. They were left high and dry, at the mercy of some foreign cartel, and we are told that somewhere, sometime we will have energy self-sufficiency.

The Conservatives, while in opposition, were in full support of Canada's self-sufficiency. They agreed with the government. But they had a better way of doing things—they always have a better way of doing things. Now that they have been given the opportunity to do something, they do nothing but put the matter on hold.

The Conservatives had a better way to Canadianize the industry, yet there is not one word, not one initiative, in this legislation that pertains to Canadianization. All this bill does is preserve the status quo which existed prior to the bill. Neither Canadianization nor security of supply has been adequately addressed by Bill C-5, but it has the "framework," the "foundation." All of the unemployed in Canada and all of those men going bankrupt can look at that great framework, that great foundation, and wait for some day in the sweet bye and bye.

Mr. Robert Strong, President of the Newfoundland Ocean Industries Association, appeared before the Energy Committee. It was interesting to hear him say that they have built a reasonably healthy infrastructure from zero in 1979 to a good business infrastructure at present, one which serves exploratory activities. What happened in 1979, honourable senators? That was the year that the National Energy Program was developed—that program that was damned by this Conservative Party from one end of Canada to the other. Despite that damnation, what happened to the Newfoundland Ocean Industries Association? It went from zero to a good business infrastructure today. The members of that association are concerned about their ability ever to respond to Hibernia, should it develop, because of this do-nothing, ignore-the-problem government. Last year there was a decrease from 3,600 jobs to 1,200 jobs, and those 1,200 will go this winter when the drilling season ceases in the maritime provinces. Mr. Strong told us that the situation was depressing, that service companies are closing their doors, folding up, going bankrupt, moving back west, or whatever, he did not know. Depressing it is, yet we have the structure. We have the “structure,” the “foundation” and the “window of opportunity” from this government. That is all we have, honourable senators—we have nothing for those people in the maritime provinces who are going down the drain with their life's savings. Mr. Strong said that if we are committed to self-sufficiency, we should do something and, in the name of God, do something now.

What have we done? We have brought forth Bill C-5, the legislative framework and the cornerstone.

Honourable senators, the Energy Committee also heard from Mr. David Lyons, Chairman of the Maritime Technology Society of Halifax, who had much the same to say. He was also concerned about the lack of recognition of the technological development in the maritime provinces. The men who have gained these skills over recent years under the terrible National Energy Program, the men who have built that technology in the maritime provinces, are now being scattered across Canada because this government has nothing to do but put forth cornerstones and frameworks. The terrible National Energy Program was criticized up and down all across Canada, yet, under that very program, we created a drilling capability on the Atlantic offshore that could find oil cheaper than and as well as any multinational organization in the world. And it was Canadian! We built a fleet of Canadian supply boats in Saint John harbour, all under the NEP. That fleet has now gone to Asia. Of the two submersibles that were built in Canada one has gone to Asia. What policy do they have over there? Do they have a window of opportunity and a framework? I imagine they have more than that to offer, and they have more than was offered for the benefit of the oil industry of the maritimes.

Honourable senators, the Energy Committee in its 1985 report spoke of complacency—complacency which was invading the policy-making process. It spoke of the lack of concern about Canada's future supplies of oil. That observation was reaffirmed in our 1986 report.

I submit to honourable senators that Bill C-5 is a manifestation of that complacency. There is no concern for self-sufficiency and no concern for the Canadianization of the industry. We will deliver ourselves into the international oil market in the hope that someday this great market—which is not a free market, which is controlled by the cartel—will deliver us and provide us with what is necessary for the development of our resources. We have no imagination, no national will, as one witness told the members of the committee. What we need is national will and leadership, both of which are not present in the government of today. That witness told the members of the committee that this country had the will—and I am repeating his evidence, generally—to build the Trans-Canada Highway, to build the Seaway and to open up the north. We need that will and that leadership today in energy policy.

Bill C-5 is certainly no answer to the future energy policy of Canada. It may be a framework, but we have to do more than just put a framework up and admire the framework. As I said before, it is a manifestation of that complacency that exists in energy policy today.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I should like to participate in the debate, but, before doing so in any detail, let me congratulate Senator Hastings on a fine speech and thank him for pointing out to us the difficulties that we will face in the future as a result of this government's policy of total reliance on the marketplace for the energy future of this country in terms of additional development that has to take place.

Senator Hastings has ably pointed out that this is a very precarious policy to have at this time because the international marketplace is not really a free market, or a true market, but one that is manipulated by countries that have long-term resources when compared to Canada's resources.

I should like to discuss a specific provision of Bill C-5. I have received representations regarding this particular provision, and I should like honourable senators to be aware of those representations. The provision I wish to discuss is contained in clause 101(7)(d)(ii). I do not intend to read it, but I will describe that provision. It repeats a similar provision which is contained in the Canada Oil and Gas Act, which this bill replaces, and it is that companies that carry out seismic work—and the area of interest for our purpose is seismic work on the Canadian frontier—in the Beaufort area and offshore east coast carry out that seismic work for their own purposes, with a view to selling that information at a later date. The companies find that the information which they must file with the Government of Canada will be made public after five years.

The international price of oil has fallen precipitously and exploration and development in those remote areas has come to a halt and is likely to be stopped for some considerable period of time. Accordingly, this five-year period is very short, having regard to the huge amount of money that these companies have spent to get the information.

However, the information can fall into two categories. One is information gathered that, at the time of its being gathered, qualified for Petroleum Incentive Payments. So, there was a substantial participation by the Canadian taxpayer in carrying out the work. I think in that case there is not much argument that that kind of information should be made public at an early date. However, much work was done on a speculative or a reconnaissance basis, and where that is the case, it seems to me that those companies should have a reasonable time within which to hold a proprietary interest in the information so that people who will find it useful will pay for the information that those companies have gathered on a speculative basis.

My point is that the current five years is not long enough to give them adequate proprietary rights. They should not be given the right to hold the information forever, because there is a public interest in this information being made available, having regard to our future security in terms of energy supply.

I think that we should revisit—I guess I am speaking to the government on this—this clause and consider it once again in light of the current energy pricing environment. This is a matter which I took the opportunity to ask the minister a question on when he appeared before the committee last week. He referred the matter to one of the members of his department who said that extensive consultation with the industry had occurred and that, as a result of that consultation, they made a determination and decided to leave it precisely as it was before.

I submit that that consultation must have taken place for the most part during a time when energy prices were very high and when the reasonable expectation was that companies would buy the information within a reasonable period of time. Now that the price is very low, I think that that time period should be changed. Perhaps some administrative discretion is necessary, but the companies which gather information should be given a reasonable time to recover their costs, hopefully with some profit, so that they will have an incentive to continue doing this work in the future and so that it will be available for purchase by exploration companies which want to carry out programs in those remote areas.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, when Senator Barootes moved the second reading of Bill C-5, he said:

—this period of low prices offers us a window of opportunity to establish a frontier energy strategy which is fair rather than discriminatory—one which is responsive to markets rather than to artificial stimulation by government incentives.

It is the word “markets” which attracts my attention. The concept of a market is one that is fairly clear in the literature of economics. A market is a place of exchange characterized by competition. A market entails many sellers and many buyers. When one does not have those fundamental requirements, one does not have a market. There may be market characteristics to some extent, but the basic quality of a market is that it is genuinely competitive.

I noticed that Senator Barootes relied strongly on the concept of a market; I noticed that the two senators who spoke earlier today brought up the notion of a market. I wonder how relevant the concept of a market is to this particular industry.

When I read Senator Barootes’ speech just now to refresh my mind as to what he did say, I thought how things had changed over the years. I thought back to the days when the Grits were denouncing Sir John A. Macdonald for wanting to use government incentives to build a railway to the Northwest Territories. Grit orators opposed him in the name of “the market.” They said, “If in God’s good time people are to live in those parts, those far distant parts of this continent, then market forces will prompt entrepreneurs to raise capital in the money markets of the world and to build those expensive lines of railway and those bridges, but let us not interfere.” I try to imitate their Scottish accents. “Let us not interfere with God’s providential order of the market by these intrusions, these government interventions favoured by the Conservative ministry.” Well, honourable senators, how times have changed!

When a senator from Saskatchewan, from what in those days were referred to as “the territories,” should rise here and say that nothing should be done except to be responsive to the market, and that we should have none of this artificial stimulation by government incentives, how things have changed! Would the western parts of Canada ever have been developed in line with the vision of Sir John A. Macdonald, or of any other visionary Canadian politician, if that kind of negativism had prevailed, and all based on the notion of something called “the market” which, I suggest to you, both with regard to the railways in the 1870s and the oil and gas industry in the 1980s, is simply an ideological illusion?

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Barootes speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, I take this opportunity to thank my three colleagues in the Senate for their interesting and, at times, cogent remarks.

Senator Nurgitz: Which times?

Senator Barootes: I would like to mention that I am not tied to the policies of Sir John A. Macdonald, although my admiration for him goes about as deep as it does for any Prime Minister at any time. However, situations in this world have changed as we evolved from a bald, uninhabited country to a more developed country. Nor could Sir John A. have imagined, when the grants were made to the Canadian Pacific, that perhaps one of the greatest sources of revenue today would be something that never even entered his imagination, that being the mineral and oil rights under the lands which were granted and which are now represented by Pan Canadian Petroleums.

We are prepared to refer this bill to committee. However, may I make a couple of remarks about the ray of sunshine, because there may be on the horizon just a couple more little rays of sunshine which may bring some comfort to those who are suffering during this depressed oil period. Perhaps it would be a help if I referred back to my speech in seconding the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne in which I said that the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax was being removed some 30 months earlier than anticipated. Then I added:

—when coupled with the anticipated provincial royalty revisions which are anticipated, [it] will be a welcome and timely relief to the western oil industry, especially in Alberta.

I went on to say that it may help to avoid bankruptcies and restore some employment and activity in exploration. Indeed, this has come to pass with the announcement from Alberta of $1 billion of relief in the royalty structure of that province for oil exploration and development work. I hope, as all of us in this house must hope—certainly those of us from the western provinces hope—that this incentive will give some stimulus and impetus to the dead and dying period of which the honourable senator spoke and to the 55,000 unemployed oil field workers.

The second element of a slight ray of sunshine is on the other side of the country. It occurred when I read in one of the business newspapers over the weekend that an official of Mobil Oil Company, which is the driving force behind the Hibernia exploration, mentioned that if the recent temporary rise in the per barrel price of oil—which, I understand, dropped again today—were to continue for a short time and if it were to stabilize, he could see some opportunity for proceeding with the development of the Hibernia field. Indeed, that, for all of us, would be a most welcome thing, to see that eventuality become an actuality for our friends on the east coast. It would be good for all of Canada.

I do not wish to comment in rebuttal of the various statements that have been made. I sympathize greatly with Senator Hays' observation about geological information and intelligence, which may not now be taken up as quickly as we would wish because of the drop in oil prices. Perhaps this area of the act could be reviewed. I am not certain that anybody on this side of the house accepts that we have deserted the policy of oil self-sufficiency for Canada. Some efforts have been undertaken. This government is assisting organizations such as the Co-op Upgrader for heavy oil and engineering with regard to the Husky upgrader. These endeavours might help to restore our march toward oil self-sufficiency. I wish that we had control over the price of oil in the world market, whether it be manipulated or operated by a cartel, but, unfortunately, with only an output in world oil products of 2 per cent, it is pretty hard for us to enforce our wishes upon those countries that have 40 per cent and 50 per cent of that oil market. Canadianization has not been deserted. The policy of the 50 per cent Canadian ownership rate remains.

I point out that during this last year or so Gulf Canada, which was controlled by the Gulf Corporation of the United States, has been Canadianized. To my delight, it has been done without spending one single cent of taxpayers' dollars. That, I think, is a good thing.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

[Senator Barootes.]

Senator Hastings: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Barootes, bill referred to Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Cogger, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, for an Address to Her Excellency the Governor General in reply to Her Speech at the opening of the Session.—(Honourable Senator Rowe) (5th day of resuming debate).

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, at the outset I should like to express my thanks to those who have participated in this debate. However, I cannot help but utter one sour note which relates to the fact that, as has been the case over the past 15 years, no matter how well reasoned, no matter how much work has been devoted to the Speech and no matter how original some of the thinking may be behind it, the world will hear no more about most of it because 98 per cent of the views expressed in that Speech die right here in this chamber. I have never ceased to be surprised by that fact and I have never ceased to regret it.

Honourable senators, I will confine my discussion today to two topics, one is unemployment and the other is the relationship between education and unemployment. The most unfair attitude any body or bodies could bring to bear on the subject of unemployment is that which, either directly or by implication, expresses the view that those men and women seeking to obtain able-bodied relief or unemployment insurance are not really interested in getting real work and that they are quite happy as long as that relief or insurance continues. That idea has been promulgated more and more in recent weeks in several connections.

Honourable senators, I want to discuss for a moment the history of Newfoundland. I am not being parochial in my attitude, I am using Newfoundland as an example because it is a microcosm of what has happened and what is happening today in so many other parts of Canada.

In 1931, 1932 and 1933, through a combination of factors totally beyond the control of either the people or the government of Newfoundland, Newfoundland's economy collapsed. The collapse was attributable to poor fisheries, economic collapse in the Mediterranean, the Caribbean and South America, and failure of the three historic fisheries of Newfoundland, the inshore, the Grand Banks and the Labrador. Another contributing factor was complete failure of the fisheries due to ice, "dirty water" as they call it, and many other factors, some of which were not recognized at the time but the results of which we have had to live with. The Newfoundland economy collapsed through no fault of the people of Newfoundland. In 1934 a Commission of Government was set up under the total control of the government at Westminster, the British government. The commission was comprised of six men who were appointed at Whitehall and the Governor, an English appointee, became ex officio, the chairman of that commission. After five years of Commission Government, by 1939 there were just as many able-bodied men and women receiving relief as there had been when the Newfoundland economy collapsed in 1932-33, and Newfoundland's economy did not improve appreciably. Even as late as 1941, the height of World War II, conditions had not improved apart from the fact that several thousands of Newfoundlanders had joined the various armed services.

In the spring of 1941 Britain and the United States arrived at the first of the lend-lease agreements, commonly referred to as the "destroyer deal". You will recall that the then president of the United States, President Roosevelt, used as an excuse the lend-lease to enable him to make available 50 so-called over-aged destroyers for British and Allied use. In return for that, the United States was given the right to build three huge bases in Newfoundland, one at Quidi Vidi Lake, later known as Fort Petterrell, an army base; one at Argentia in Placentia Bay, down the coast from Come-By-Chance; and one at Stephenville where the air base was established. In addition to these great bases, most people did not take into account the fact that there were scores of smaller bases dotted all over Newfoundland and Labrador, because it became clear to the Americans, as it did to many others, that if Germany succeeded in conquering England, as most people thought it would in 1940-41, the next target would, of course, be eastern North America, and Newfoundland was the logical place to strike. Newfoundland became one great bastion of armed might. That meant that thousands upon thousands of Newfoundlanders were able, for the first time in years—and in some cases for the first time in their lives—to look forward to the possibility that they might have a job of work.

Honourable senators will forgive this personal allusion, but it will serve as a background to what I am leading up to. In the spring of that year I had just completed my training period with the Canadian Officer Training Corps, the COTC, and had returned to Newfoundland to take up my duties with the Canadian Legion and the Royal Navy Educational Services in St. John's, Newfoundland. I had one month between completing my training and taking up my new responsibilities. Being married with a family and trying to attain some university education, naturally, I needed as much money as I could earn. On the Monday morning I went down at 8 a.m. As I entered the grounds of Pleasantville, I saw the largest number of men outdoors that I had ever seen at one time. I do not believe there were any women there. The American colonel to whom I had to report told me that according to their estimate there were 5,000 men—standing, lying, sitting on the ground. I said,

"What are those men doing?" The reply was: "They are here waiting for the chance to get a job. Some of them have been here for several days, and their relatives bring them blankets and food." Those were men whom a lot of well-to-do men and women in Newfoundland at the time regarded as being too lazy to work. Those were men who had been on the dole, receiving six cents per day during the 1930s. Those were men who were supposed not to want work. Within another two years there was not one unemployed able-bodied man in Newfoundland or Labrador—the first time since the latter years of World War I. At that time there was full employment; and that was the first time since the war of 1812 between the United States and Great Britain. Those were the three occasions when there was no unemployment in Newfoundland.

I repeat, unemployment in Canada is not unique to Newfoundland. We hear a great deal about it, because in Newfoundland unemployment is inclined to be endemic. Apart from those half dozen years altogether there has always been serious unemployment in Newfoundland. That is because of the nature of the economy, and not because Newfoundlanders do not want to work.

We are not alone in this. As a province we probably have more unemployment than any other province. I have never got over the surprise that I experienced at university when one of my history professors told me that possibly the greatest artistic and engineering feats of all time—namely, the Egyptian Pyramids, the Great Wall of China, the Parthenon in Greece, and the Mayan, Aztec and Inca civilizations of Mexico and Central and South America—were designed largely to provide jobs for people who were out of work. It is hard to believe, when one stands on the Great Wall of China, that it was a program of work relief. Apparently that was one of the major factors. Another was, of course, defence.

I should point out that that does not represent my opinion. I do not know enough about it. I have studied a good deal of history in my time, but I do not know whether that would be accepted by the majority of history scholars. Probably there is some truth to it.

Canada has more than Newfoundland to worry about in the matter of unemployment. If we were to stop thinking in provincial terms and think instead in regional terms, there are some areas in Canada where unemployment would be significantly higher than it is in Newfoundland. I believe that point needs to be stressed, because some observers and commentators fail to realize the importance of that. We hear a great deal about unemployment in Newfoundland, but what is true of Newfoundland is equally true of many other parts of Canada, including some areas in some of our wealthier provinces.

In attempting to find solutions to the Newfoundland problem, Canadians simultaneously are trying to find solutions to problems that are scattered all over Canada. We find them even in Ontario and British Columbia, areas where there is serious and chronic unemployment which, in some cases, is endemic.

The situation in Newfoundland is not a complete tale of woe. There are some bright spots. We all hope—although some are inclined to be rather skeptical or dubious about it—that the great billion dollar refinery at Come-By-Chance has been given a new lease on life. If that is so, it could well mean the beginning of a new round of industrial development.

Here we must adopt a cautious approach. However, it does appear to me to be within the bounds of common sense to expect that those vast resources that we know exist in and around Newfoundland will not continue to be dormant much longer. We have the greatest fishery in the world. As we say in Newfoundland, the province is “plunk down” in the middle of the greatest fishery on earth, and with the population increasing as it is all over the world, and with the demand for fish protein increasing, it seems to me that we are not expecting too much. We have the greatest single hydro development in Labrador. I refer to the Churchill River; and there are other great rivers that drop 2,000 feet to the Atlantic Ocean. There are enormous quantities of power there.

We also have oil. Let us make no mistake, the oil is there. The only reason it has not been developed during the past few years is because of the economics involved. But it will be developed. We also have known forestry and mineral resources. It is almost beyond belief that those vast resources, in time of peace, have never been developed to provide a decent livelihood for what is now 600,000 Newfoundlanders. What is the answer? I believe it will require more than just the economists to figure it out.

Newfoundland has another great resource which I have not mentioned so far. Thirty five years ago Newfoundland had one seat of higher education, namely, a university college, which provided two years of post-secondary education—two years toward a degree. Yesterday I was chatting with the President of Memorial University. He is a Newfoundlander from a fishing family in one of our fishing communities who today is one of the greatest Canadian educators—make no mistake about that. When I graduated from University College in the 1930s, there were approximately 200 students—I stand to be corrected—at that institution. Yesterday Dr. Harris told me that registration in that great university—embracing some of the leading schools of engineering, medicine, education and so on—had reached a total of 17,000 students. In the last 25 years, university faculties, university schools and departments have proliferated. In addition to the normal disciplines in the arts, in the sciences and in education, there now exists an institute of social and economic research, an institute for research in human abilities—and most of these I am reciting now are original in Canada—a school of medicine and the health sciences complex which—the two of them together, the great hospital there and the science complex—have attracted the attention of medical scientists throughout the world.

Another recognized activity is the role being played by Memorial University in cold-water research. Make no mistake about it, honourable senators, this is one of the great potentials in Newfoundland and in Canada. There is pioneer work being conducted in ocean engineering and in earth science technology, and, indeed, in other pioneering fields such as satellite communications with remote areas and work in the field of genetics, to name only two. How many Canadians are there today who know that that university, in the most eastern part of Canada, is doing research in cancer today which is not only pioneering but also attracting cancer scientists from various parts of the world. This is being done in a university which did not even exist 40 years ago.

I mentioned, by the way, this matter of cold-water research. It was quite a coincidence that I came across an article in the Gazette after I had prepared these notes. This is the Gazette belonging to Memorial University. It is put out once a week. This issue came to me yesterday. It says, “Ground broken for new CERR building”. I didn’t have the faintest idea what it was. I knew it was an acronym of some sort—but what did it mean? Well, I soon found out.

A jackhammer wielded by federal Minister of Transportation John C. Crosbie and Premier Brian Peckford has broken the ceremonial first piece of asphalt from parking lot 16, the site of the new building for Memorial’s Centre for Earth Resources Research.

There is a picture, for those interested, of the Premier and Mr. Crosbie as they are performing that ceremonial function. I will read this further and then I will table the document, honourable senators.

The commitment of $25 million . . . to the construction of a new building—

And this $25 million is purely for the building itself, not for anything that will go into it—

. . . to house the centre was announced in February of this year, one year after the signing of the Atlantic Accord about which we have heard so much.

The article then goes on to report what Dr. Harris, President of Memorial University, and Mr. Crosbie had to say about this matter.

Honourable senators, you have heard me on this topic before. Why is this imposed on you again? The reason is very simple: These activities that I have been describing, that are being carried on by our universities, are resulting in our universities finding themselves below the minimum.

I did not hear Senator Hicks’ speech the other day, but I read it today. He brought the attention of Canada to this problem. The salaries of professional staff have not kept pace with those in most Canadian universities—and I am speaking about Newfoundland’s university now. In fact, in some cases there are discrepancies as high as 25 per cent between salaries being paid, say, at the University of Manitoba or at UBC, or whatever, and Newfoundland, even when the responsibilities are identical. This does not give me any pleasure—and I am sure it gives no Canadian any pleasure—but we heard what our Nobel Prize winner had to say about this the other day. I do not think he meant to be taken too literally, but when he advised young Canadians to go to United States, clearly there was some serious note behind it. Hardly a week goes by—and

I have the authority of the president of the university on this—that some medical doctor, or physicist, or mathematician, or historian, or educator doesn't leave Newfoundland for greener financial pastures. A disheartening and frustrating feature is that in almost every case the personnel involved would like to remain in Newfoundland. We find that over and over again, and that is not a figment of our imagination; that is so. When people come to Newfoundland, as so many did in the early years of the university, medical doctors and practitioners from Harley Street ended up in our new medical school. In almost every case, those people would like to remain in Newfoundland. Newfoundland has many deficiencies and defects, but once people have been there practising for two or three years, or teaching, or whatever, they would like to live on there. But, of course, there comes a time when the discrepancy becomes too large and they have to think of their families, so they leave. The original missionary impulse—and that was a very strong impulse, believe me—is usually most evident at the pioneer stage, and when our medical school was founded dozens of our medical and scientific specialists—some of them of world renown, some of them, by the way, connected with this very body—offered their services to Memorial. Leading surgeons from Britain, psychologists, psychiatrists, and so on, offered their services and were accepted at Memorial. But this missionary impulse, valuable as it was and is, cannot be relied on to tolerate discrepancies of salary and professional standards indefinitely. The drain of professional talent from Newfoundland to other parts of Canada and the United States is reaching serious proportions. At the rate we are going inevitably there will be stagnation and eventual decline—even in the face of the dedication of the staff—unless heroic steps are taken. This situation applies to most, if not all, of our Canadian universities. I am sure I do not need to say in this chamber that the problem that besets Newfoundland vis-à-vis the other universities of Canada is the same problem that confronts the universities of Canada vis-à-vis the universities in the United States. I want to stress that point again—the impulse to be a missionary, to be part of the pioneering effort, valuable as it was—and still is to some extent—cannot be relied upon to tolerate discrepancies in salary, et cetera, indefinitely.

• (1600)

Some of you may find this a little difficult to accept, but a university can be regarded as an industry, in my view. Apart from the direct employment that it provides, it stimulates other activities and invariably plays a role in creating high community and provincial standards. One needs only to look at our sister provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to realize what a powerful force a university can be in areas which would otherwise have unacceptable standards. If by some calamity Acadia University and Mount Allison were eliminated tonight and when tomorrow dawned, they did not exist, I ask you what would be the fate of Wolfville or Sackville as communities? I have not visited either of those towns in recent years, although Mount Allison is one of my Alma Maters. When I was there the town of Sackville depended on two things, mostly the university and, to some extent, the railway, and I would imagine that today the railway does not play a very important role.

I have said before and, at the risk of being thought repetitious, I will say it again: Newfoundland cannot afford a policy of retrenchment in the university field without doing irreparable damage to both its culture and its economy. This is true, of course, for every area in Canada where a university is playing a disproportionate part in the life of what would otherwise be a small community. As I said, if you remove Acadia or Mount Allison from their respective locales, you destroy the communities involved. As honourable senators are aware, there are small communities from Cape Spear to Vancouver Island that are largely dependent for their economic existence on the universities. In other words, the universities are industries, circulating money and, to some extent, creating new wealth just as much as is created by, for instance, the mining of iron ore in Labrador.

In the case of Newfoundland, far from retrenching at the university level, we should be following the example set 100 years ago by some of the smaller countries of Europe, a practice that has continued ever since. I am sure honourable senators are aware that it is not an accident that countries such as Denmark, Holland or Switzerland—and perhaps a dozen more—today have some of the highest standards of living in the world. These standards are the result of the emphasis on education in its various branches. The United States, for example, is not among them. Perhaps they have more millionaires than any other country, but if you want to find a generally high standard of living today, you go to a country such as Denmark, Sweden or Norway. The standards of living that exist in those countries today are the result of emphasis on education.

I indicated earlier that Newfoundland has made enormous progress in such fields as earth sciences and cold-water engineering. I did not make up that terminology; today it is used everywhere in scientific circles. However, the university cannot maintain these activities and still absorb budget decreases. It seems to me that the time has come when we must think increasingly in terms of national policy.

The problems that I have delineated that exist in Newfoundland cannot be solved by Newfoundland itself any more than the problems in certain parts of the western provinces can be solved by those provinces or regions or areas. There is no doubt that Newfoundland is one of the underprivileged parts of Canada, but it is not alone. Underprivileged areas are to be found all over Canada—and here I am deliberately repeating myself. One of the tools which we should increasingly use to reduce the number of underprivileged citizens is the university, but there must be national programs for such efforts. We have seen that even with very limited resources, a university such as Memorial can do outstanding work, and where this happens invariably there is a dramatic increase in general standards of living, brought about largely by that university.

The earth sciences program in Newfoundland is limited in scope for obvious reasons; similarly, the program in cold-water research and engineering. What is needed is a great national centre capable of bringing together all available resources and capable also of attacking problems in a massive way. Honourable senators, when I prepared those notes I was not aware that a centre, in fact, had been created. I am highly gratified—as I am sure is every other Newfoundlander—to know that this has happened. It is the very thing, on a small scale, that I have been advocating. Other areas of endeavour in Newfoundland and in Canada are waiting for fresh, new and, I repeat, massive applications of capital and, more important than capital, imagination.

This past summer my wife and I drove along the west coast of Newfoundland. I ask honourable senators to visualize the island of Newfoundland, to see that Great Northern Peninsula, which starts at Bonne Bay and takes in Gros Morne Park. The Atlantic is to one side of it while the Gulf of St. Lawrence is to the other. I ask senators to bear with me for two or three more minutes while I try to describe this trip. Senator Le Moynes can confirm what I am about to say because, although it may be difficult to believe, he is an authority on that part of Newfoundland. Senator Marshall can also bear me out, because my recollection is that his riding included St. Barbe. Is that not correct, Senator Doody?

Senator Doody: Yes, it was Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe.

Senator Rowe: St. Barbe is located on the northwest coast of the Great Northern Peninsula. There we find Gros Morne Park. I do not pretend to be an expert on these matters, but those who are all say the same thing: Gros Morne Park has only one equal in all of Canada, and that is somewhere in the Northwest Territories. The name I cannot pronounce and, at this moment, cannot remember, but it is a great primitive national park. We in Newfoundland have Gros Morne Park, where one will find the unbelievable beauty—and I am choosing my words deliberately now—of Bonne Bay. We also have something that is different from anything else in the geophysical world—we have Western Brook Pond. I will not describe it, but I do hope that senators will go down some time to see it. They will not believe it.

In that area are some of the oldest archaeological findings in eastern Canada. At a place called Port au Choix can be found the remains of the archaic Indians and the Dorset Eskimos. Those remains have been carbon dated and have been found to be 7,000 or 8,000 years old. There was a time when we thought that 500 or 600 years was the limit of man's knowledge in those areas.

Across the Strait of Belle Isle are the remnants of the Basque whalers, whose enterprises date back to the early 1500s and quite possibly antedated the discoveries of Columbus and Cabot. At Lance Amour are archaeological artifacts dating back 7,000 or 8,000 years. At the northern tip of Newfoundland can be found the first Viking sites in North America, which were established 500 years before Columbus ever thought about going across the Atlantic.

Honourable senators, this trip takes about two days of leisurely travel. What I am leading up to in my somewhat round-about way is the fact that here we have some of the leading tourist attractions in all of Canada. I would venture so far as to suggest—and I have not discussed this with Senator Le Moynes; we are not in collusion on the matter—that in that stretch there are to be found several of the major archaeological findings on the face of this earth. There are geological features which are absolutely unique. From the point of view of tourism, that area—every inch of which is accessible by paved road—has not been utilized to 10 per cent of its potential. But it is clear that Newfoundland cannot on its own undertake a program that would attract thousands upon thousands of tourists from the rest of Canada and from the rest of the world.

Honourable senators, I have cited only a few possibilities today. I can best sum up what I have been saying by emphasizing once more that the poverty, deprivation and unemployment plaguing parts of every province in the nation do not represent insoluble problems. In its modest way—and it is not actually too modest—Memorial University has provided leadership in the areas of marine biology, earth sciences, remote communication and medical science, but the surface has only been scratched. When Dr. Harris described to me what is being done at that university, I could not believe my ears. That my Newfoundland—that place settled by my ancestors, the ancestors of Senator Doody and others three or four hundred years ago—that that rock out there could be the focal point of so much of this activity was unbelievable to me. I repeat that the surface has only been scratched. I ask whoever is listening to me now, or whoever will read what I have said, to believe that what must be provided is not retrenchment but expansion in these fields. We need private enterprise, courage, money and, perhaps more than anything else, imagination. Failing these, and I say this with all of the conviction of my being, we in Newfoundland—and, by extrapolation, those in other parts of Canada—can only look forward to continuing want and misery.

Honourable senators, I do not want to conclude on such a negative note. I believe that Newfoundland will, in time, overcome some of these horrendous problems. If I did not believe that, I would encourage my grandchildren to get out and to stay out. But I believe that Newfoundland will overcome these problems and that it will continue to do what it has already done over the years—it will continue to make a worthwhile contribution to the Canadian nation.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

● (1620)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators,

The legislative program is very promising. What remains to be seen is whether the Government will have the competence, the will and the resources to implement at least part of that program.

With these words, Michel Roy, writing in La Presse on October 2 of this year, concluded his analysis of the Throne Speech pronounced the day before by Her Excellency the Governor General.

Elsewhere in his article, the columnist said that the Throne Speech showed both continuity and change. Continuity, because it repeats the major themes launched by the government in its legislative program for 1984, namely, national reconciliation and economic renewal.

Change, because the Prime Minister and his cabinet have included one aspect they neglected two years ago, and that is the social policies so dear to the hearts of Canadians.

Not only did I agree with Mr. Roy that this is a good Throne Speech, but I am convinced, with a growing number of Canadians, that despite certain mistakes largely due to a lack of experience in government administration on the part of several ministers, mistakes highlighted by a press that was constantly on the lookout for the slightest sign of weakness, and due also to unreasonably high expectations on the part of voters after the landslide victory in 1984, and as I was saying, I am convinced that by pursuing this cleanup of our public finances which includes controlling the national debt, the Government will be able to demonstrate, as it has been doing for two years, that it has the will and the ability to make life better for all Canadians and that it can make the necessary, sustained and courageous effort to do so.

The legislative program announced on October 1 will also be a constant reminder to the government and to Canadians in the years to come, as ambitious as the initial program of 1984 which over the last two years has formed the basis for Prime Minister Mulroney's successful attempts to remedy the disastrous state of affairs inherited from Trudeau, MacEachen and company.

The Progressive Conservative Party and its leader did not promise perfection during the election campaign. Some will say that is what the Liberals promised, but in any case, perfection is unattainable. However, the tangible results to date with respect to economic renewal, national reconciliation, constructive internationalism and social justice appear to promise better days, while bills will be introduced and programs implemented following the requisite, and I hope sustained, consultations with all public and private intervenors.

Honourable senators, before going any further and commenting on certain aspects of this Speech from the Throne, I would like to congratulate Senators Cogger and Barootes on moving and seconding the motion for adopting an Address in Reply to Her Excellency the Governor General.

By his very pertinent remarks and the moderation for which he is well known by those who had dealings with him before his appointment to the Senate, Senator Cogger has shown that he is very familiar with the country and the Province of Quebec which he represents here, and that he is particularly well prepared to serve all Canadians.

As to Senator Barootes, once again he was able to show compassion for destitute people, genuine understanding of past and current events, and, I must say, exemplary patience in the face of remarks and interruptions by Senator Steuart of Saskatchewan.

In the future I intend to draw inspiration from the wisdom and experience of these two colleagues. To all other senators who spoke before me in this debate I confess openly that, once again, their contributions have shown me the extent of the work I will have to do in years to come, namely to become familiar with the problems facing Canadians, both men and women, their complexity and multiplicity, and the importance of having a thorough knowledge of all regions of Canada, the people who inhabit them, the solutions they propose, and their very legitimate aspirations.

This is why in the coming years I intend to make a special effort to get to know my Senate colleagues as well as the men and women they represent in this institution.

Undoubtedly, Senator Murray—with Mrs. Robertson—was the senator I knew best when I came to Ottawa last year. I even had been in a position to appreciate the judicious advice he gave to the New Brunswick government when he was working in that province. His talents as a great strategist and his formidable academic training proved to be very handy tools which did contribute immensely to the quality of Richard Hatfield's administration.

Therefore I can only rejoice at his appointment to the federal cabinet and as Leader of the Senate. In his first address as Leader of the Government in the Senate last October 7, he showed he was prepared to do his best, and he proved he could respond with thoughtfulness, enlightenment and logic. The Leader of the Opposition should be wary if ever he should attempt to talk to us about the "great Liberal years" in terms of a competent, foibleless and exemplary Canadian administration.

Honourable senators, I think we can look forward to very interesting debates during the mandate of Senator Murray if the 31 interruptions by opposition senators—including 15 by Senator MacEachen—during Senator Murray's first speech on October 7 are any indication.

So I commend Senator Murray for an excellent session opening, and I trust Senator MacEachen and his opposition colleagues will learn to be patient.

Today, honourable senators, I should like to refer specifically to two themes mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, economic renewal and Canada's linguistic duality.

In the Throne Speech, the following may be read:

Despite current difficulties, encouraging progress has been made towards renewing and strengthening the national economy. Unemployment is at its lowest level in over four years. Average incomes of Canadian families rose in real terms in 1985 for the first time in five years. The federal deficit has declined for the first time in six years. The prime rate is the lowest it has been in eight years. And government program spending has significantly declined for the first time in forty years. These economic indicators are encouraging.

Honourable senators, that is a record of accomplishments any government could be proud of.

I even suspect the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, were he in a government capable of such a performance, would be the first to advise his colleagues to publish the results of such sound management across the land, notwithstanding the cost to the Canadian taxpayer as they did so often when in power.

Speaking for myself and the people of New Brunswick whom I represent in the Senate, I suggest this is an enviable record, although still not good enough. The Prime Minister was the first to admit it recently in Moncton, and he said so on a few occasions elsewhere, that record is not good enough. I support his views. For that reason, the government is getting ready to do better in the maritimes, where progress has been slower. So we will have to do better, even though in doing so the government in the future, as it did in the last two years, will have to face the opposition of Liberals, New Democrats and almost every labour leader, as well as certain media, whenever steps are taken to reduce the deficit and financing requirements, to negotiate a free-trade agreement with the United States, to amend social programs, to review the unemployment insurance system, to introduce initiatives to foster regional development and so forth.

There was a comment made by the Opposition Leader in this house which I found amusing. He said in substance, in his speech of October 7, that what the maritimes need is public money, plenty of public money, and the support of citizens in the area.

I think Senator MacEachen was partially right. Indeed, public support is needed, and the experience in Cape Breton after the federal response is convincing, and after that federal response, the response by entrepreneurs was forthcoming. Senator Murray referred to that. In terms of jobs and planned public investments, we can say the income tax credit and Cape Breton promotion programs have had a resounding success.

So there we have a process that is much more successful than the mere wasting of public moneys and the suggestion to spend $104 million a year to build up heavy water reserves, two suggestions made by the former minister and Liberal federal member for the area.

Senator MacEachen should know better, and he does know better, because he and his colleagues during the years they were in power made extravagant expenditures on all sorts of band-aid solutions.

As someone once said, self-examination leads me to despair, but self-comparison helps me repair.

It is especially true when we compare this government's approach with that of the Trudeau government.

Therefore, in terms of economic renewal and the more specific component of regional development, I am proud of what has been undertaken and of the results obtained, and I look forward to the future.

• (1630)

In this respect, I was particularly gratified by the message delivered by the Prime Minister on his visit to Moncton last October 17, to the Economic Council of New Brunswick, when he invited the population of that province to reflect collectively on the question of regional development. This is what the Prime Minister said on that night, and I quote:

First of all, we should strive mostly to make better use of the considerable amounts that are already being spent on the development of the Atlantic Region.

Secondly, the development of that region as of other regions should be achieved through the development of businesses rather than an uncontrolled growth of the public sector. We should therefore lift the obstacles limiting the growth of the private sector in the Atlantic Region. You do have businesses, not too many big ones, but a fair amount of medium and small businesses of impressive vitality. And you do have clever, innovative and courageous businessmen. If we manage to multiply ten, 20, 100 times this business structure, those entrepreneurship talents, you will see that the development of New Brunswick will gather momentum.

Thirdly, small businesses in New Brunswick and elsewhere in the Atlantic Region are faced with obstacles of a different and more challenging nature than in the more prosperous regions of the country. We are perfectly aware of that fact. Identifying those obstacles and the ways to smooth them out would be one of the main objectives of the consultations that we have undertaken with the provincial governments and the business community in the region.

Number four, the best way to help Atlantic businesses develop is to associate them more closely in drafting and implementing our development policies as well as managing our programs. Our action should be more deeply rooted in the regional reality, and we should be more closely associated with the true leaders of regional development, the business entrepreneurs, leaders and managers.

Five, we must consolidate and better coordinate our industrial and regional development efforts; we must ensure that all federal departments have the same thrust and contribute to the implementation of more coherent development strategies. This is why we announced in the Speech from the Throne the creation of a new Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

Honourable senators, I rely greatly on the greater development of the small business sector to create the jobs needed for young people and women at this time in our history.

The new minister responsible for this sector, the Honourable Bernard Valcourt, who is Member of Parliament for the region that I represent in the Senate, and his predecessor, the Honourable André Bissonnette, have already done a lot in my opinion to stimulate this sector, which, by itself, accounts for 70 per cent of all jobs in Canada.

Here are a few examples from the last two budgets:

—Better access to capital thanks to a $500,000 lifetime capital gains tax exemption;

—A higher ceiling under the Small Businesses Loans Act, adding $1 billion to available funds;

—More flexible regulations for retirement plans to allow individuals to invest up to 50 per cent of the funds allocated to RRSPs;

—Extending the small business bond program to December 31, 1987;

—Special tax credits for research and development;

—A tax credit for venture capital invested by workers; and finally, —Lowering the tax rate for small businesses from 15 to 13 per cent.

I believe that this is an excellent start, that it is promising for the future and that Canadians will benefit from other such initiatives.

For that matter, the Throne Speech provides for a tax system which is more equitable, more simple, and better adapted to our economic environment. It proposes new initiatives to ensure the competitiveness of our businesses. It provides among other things for the elimination of obstacles to economic growth by easing the burden resulting from administrative paperwork and regulation. It seeks to eliminate obstacles to interprovincial trade and introduces programs to promote small business and entrepreneurship.

To achieve this, I hope that measures will be announced to improve purchasing practices, to better follow through on initial proposals and to increase for small businesses the access to the technology of government laboratories, among other things.

Also, I hope that the more equitable tax system which the Minister of Finance announced and dealt with again at length the other day in the other chamber will be debated among all interested parties on the basis of the reform guidelines.

My impression is that a tax reform conceived in Canada by and for Canadians could become a significant addition to the initiatives already taken by the government in the areas of job creation and regional development.

I, for one, intend to follow closely this collective exercise in which the Minister of Finance has invited us to participate.

Also in the field of economic recovery, there is a major initiative which has fascinated media people, fed criticisms from opposition parties, and "stimulated" union leaders for over a year. I refer to the negotiations aimed at ensuring that Canadians have a greater access to the American market for their goods and services.

Honourable senators, we cannot help but notice that to date, the only federal political party which has had the courage to conceive, plan and encourage these negotiations is the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada.

Over the past several months, in spite of disappointing polls at the beginning and until quite recently, in spite of the often incomplete and biased studies carried out by opponents of these initiatives, in spite of fierce and increased protectionism in the United States, this government continues to show great courage and determination against all odds. That is to its credit.

At a time when the Economic Council of Canada is providing us with eloquent data and studies showing the beneficial impact the successful completion of this negotiation exercise would have, and at a time when a 57 per cent popular support for this initiative surprises even Mr. Broadbent, let us hope that Mr. Turner and company will change their minds and support this measure.

Then, you and I would no longer have to read such comments as those from Martin Cohn, whose analysis was published in the Toronto Star of October 2, and I quote:

● (1640)

[English]

Now, there are four Liberal positions on free trade: Johnston, gung-ho for negotiations; Axworthy, calling for a moratorium; Gray, flat-out opposed. And then there is Turner. As leader of the Opposition he has deftly opposed the start of negotiations while also opposing a halt to the negotiations.

If there is confusion about all the cross signals, flip-flops and equivocations, the public is not to blame.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, if I were as partisan as some opponents have described me on certain occasions in the past, and if a greater access to US markets was not so vital to Canada's future, I should be tempted to say: "People of the Liberal and NDP parties, do not hurry supporting the negotiations, for they will be carried through to a successful conclusion and the Government will be the only one to get all the credit."

[English]

However, honourable senators, I do not think that we can afford the luxury of partisan politicking. Too much is at stake. Once again, I want to urge the opposing sides to opt for common sense and responsibility to the nation. The enemy is not people in other parties. The real enemy is American protectionism. The friends who must be defended and protected are Canada's workers, who face the threat of lost livelihoods if negotiations with our neighbours to the south are a failure. Those are my views on the economic sector. The government appears in the Speech from the Throne to be indicating a willingness to continue making job creation and preservation the main thrust of its administration, and I am delighted.

Others of my honourable colleagues have touched on the social sector. Senator Brenda Robertson is one of them. Last Thursday she, once again, gave us the benefit of the vast experience she acquired in her career in provincial politics. Congratulations, Senator Robertson, and thank you. I have no doubt that you and other specialists in social programs in this chamber will be valuable advisers to the government in its review of social policies, whether they be on family assistance, child care, the elimination of the obstacles to full participation by women in community life, rectification of wage imbalances, or the campaigns against youth prostitution and the growing traffic in illegal drugs. I look forward to participating in the debate on all these vital issues.

At the moment I would like to tackle the subject of Canada's linguistic duality.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, in the Speech from the Throne, the government reminded Canadians of the linguistic duality of this country, and I quote:

Our dual linguistic heritage and unique history situate Canada within two great communities of nations, the Commonwealth and la Francophonie.

Canada is thus positioned to reaffirm its role in the world by developing joint projects with member countries of these two vast families of nations, to share with them Canadian communications and information technologies while bringing to Canadians a greater diversity of ideas and cultural expressions. By so doing, Canada will renew in innovative ways its commitment to an established institution, the Commonwealth, and contribute actively to the emergence of a new one, la Francophonie.

I am among those who want to congratulate the government on having agreed on a formula with the Government of Quebec, the Government of New Brunswick and other governments, so that at last the fertile French dimension of our Canadian character was able to manifest itself at the first Sommet de la Francophonie.

I would invite all Canadians to prepare to make their contribution to the summit that will be held in Quebec City next year.

And of course, the same invitation applies to the Commonwealth Summit that will also be held in Canada in 1987.

Honourable senators, one aspect of Canadian politics that is particularly important to me is everything that concerns our two official languages in this country.

It was with a great deal of satisfaction that I heard, in the Speech from the Throne, that the government intended to review the Official Languages Act in order to bring it into line with the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

In the last few decades we have made considerable progress in this area.

Several measures of a legal nature have been the outcome of a long period of gestation, sometimes interspersed with problematic discussions, but always leading to a better understanding of the Canadian situation and giving rise to some successful initiatives by governments as well as by the various language communities in this country.

By expressing its support for this national orientation, the present government has made it clear it intends to breathe new life into our official languages policy. At the beginning of the decade, the policy showed some signs of exhaustion. It was necessary to give it a more balanced outlook that would consider the cultural, social and economic needs of this country and its various regions, while also considering the changing attitudes of Canadians.

Having paused for a while to review the situation, the government today announces that it will introduce during this session amendments for the purpose of consolidating the gains in connection with the principle set out in both the Constitution and Charter.

I hope that these amendments will be added to other initiatives which will extend beyond federal institutions and apply to the Canadian society as a whole, making it possible for all Canadians, in their daily lives, to progress in the use of official languages, and this, in a spirit of mutual understanding and respect, in a spirit of national reconciliation.

I hope that the provincial governments, the private sector, business and volunteer people, will join this movement with enthusiasm.

I think that the language reform will be welcomed by the Canadian people. Of course, it would be a mistake to think that this would be achieved without effort. In my opinion, we must meet many challenges, including the oftentimes difficult situation faced by linguistic minorities. You will certainly admit that a nation's history is not written in 15 years. We now find however that attitudes have changed to the point that we must now enter a new phase in our linguistic development.

For, to the increasingly favourable attitude of the people, are added the efforts of the provincial governments and the renewed enthusiasm of francophone and anglophone communities in minority situations.

I note, not without pride, the attitude of the New Brunswick government which has decided, of its own free will, to have its bilingual character enshrined in the Canadian Constitution. I note also a certain open-mindedness demonstrated by the other Atlantic provinces towards their francophone communities, especially in connection with French education. I note also the recent progress made in the province of Ontario concerning French education and the establishment of French services for its francophone communities. I also note the evolution of Quebec which, while strengthening its French character, is looking at new options for its anglophone minority and offering its support to francophone communities in other provinces. Finally, I note a new will to act in the other provinces.

This makes me optimistic for the future.

Obviously, to realize our great project, we must rely mainly on the vitality and vigour of our official languages communities.

Is there any need to remind this assembly, for instance, of the vitality of the Acadians and other francophones in our beautiful Atlantic provinces? Is it necessary to underline the magnificent work done by the Université Sainte-Anne and the Acadians of Nova Scotia, in cooperation with the provincial authorities, both to develop French activities and to promote the learning of French, which is the second language in that province? And what about the small but most valiant community in Newfoundland and Labrador, which is rediscovering its identity and obtaining French classes for its children from the provincial government?

Honourable senators, we are all aware of the determination of Ontario francophones, whose fight for recognition and for their rights gives us inspiration and confidence in the future. We are also aware of the courage of our francophone fellow Canadians in Manitoba, where I trust that the principles of democracy and dialogue will succeed over legal conflicts. The situation is also changing in Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, where the francophone communities are just as dynamic and determined as elsewhere.

Promotion of the French language in Canada is not so much a question of numbers, but rather of quality and identity, both collective and national. It is also a matter of understanding and mutual respect.

It still remains that, as I have already said, we have the duty to help our communities to grow stronger and to develop fully if we want the equality of our two official languages to become a practical fact in our everyday life and not simply a legal concept.

Hopefully, this will be the thrust of the initiatives which the government will be proposing over the coming months.

In the area of legislation, I hope the revision of the Official Languages Act which will be proposed will lead to its total compliance with the provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, where language rights among others are enshrined.

In this way, we no longer will have to deplore such statements as the one we recently heard from the RCMP to the effect that the force is now reducing from 20 per cent to 14 per cent its French-speaking personnel.

Recently, the Minister of Justice indicated he was working with the provinces to have the provisions in the Criminal Code concerning the right of an accused to be heard by a judge and a jury in his own language proclaimed early next year. This is encouraging and promising.

Besides the legislation applying to the federal government, it is my hope the government will take other action that will concern all of our society. Some provisions should be aimed at better coordinating the actions of various federal departments and agencies so that they better reflect the needs of communities of both official languages.

I also encourage the government to strive for closer co-operation with the provinces, which have a leading role to play in supporting their respective communities, especially in the areas of education, the administration of justice, health services, social services, cultural services and others. Canadian men and women no doubt have noted the new environment of co-operation based on consultation and the exchange of views that developed these last few years between Ottawa and the various provincial capitals.

Because of its demographic and institutional base, Quebec has unique resources in language matters. And I am thinking not only of the Quebec government but also institutions and agencies in that province which, in the various areas of activity, including business, can make a significant contribution to the development of French-speaking communities outside Quebec and the promotion of the French language in English Canada.

Another thrust of the federal policy should be aimed at the private sector, at agencies such as volunteer organizations that are very often at the heart of day-to-day activities and exchanges between French- and English-speaking Canadians. In the final analysis, it is on that level, thanks to government incentives, that Canada's linguistic duality will express itself in practical terms in everyday life. This could be a project not only ambitious, but how exciting and enriching for the country as a whole.

Finally, a last but not the least important aspect since it is based on the future. I for one would recommend that the government give more support to the learning by everyone of the second official language, and where minority groups are concerned, that it strengthen the priority given to the full provision of education in one's own language. In this case, the step taken by the government would mainly deal with education which, as we know, comes under provincial jurisdiction. Now, it is interesting to note that present agreements concluded with the provinces and territories already provide that during a 2-year period a federal contribution of $432 million will be made for the promotion of our official languages in the educational system.

However, those agreements will come to an end in 1988. I think that their renegotiation could provide to both levels of government an opportunity to increase our efforts so that we may reach our objectives.

Those are, honourable senators, the views which I wanted to state in the Senate today. They were meant as a reminder of some principles on which is based the full development of communities in an extended society making up a country whose strength is in its diversity.

An innovating country in the continuity of its history . . .

A country which has chosen bilingualism as the symbol of its identity . . .

A country in which all regions have begun an important socio-linguistic evolution . . .

Finally, a country which will have to steer its official languages policy towards a new course which will translate into fact the equality which is already entrenched in its Constitution—and I will urge that such course be followed.

Honourable senators, as our colleague Senator Cogger said last October 2, I doubt that both sides of the house will unanimously share the views I have just expressed on the Speech from the Throne.

Still I am convinced that in the coming months we will be able to debate this issue as we will many others, and as is always the case here, with expediency, good humour and civility.

I think that the government is to be commended for its efforts in the economic sector and in the field of linguistic duality, among others.

I have no doubt that most senators will support the government, as readily as Canadian men and women will do at the next election rendez-vous. Thank you.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INDUSTRY

AEROSPACE—AWARDING OF CF-18 SERVICE CONTRACT TO CANADAIR—OWNERSHIP AND TECHNOLOGY TRANSFER CONSIDERATIONS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday, when discussing the tendering practices of the government with regard to the CF-18 contract, we asked some questions regarding the subject of foreign ownership. In his reply the first time, the Leader of the Government said:

... the determining factor was not so much the ownership of the company in question, rather ...

and he mentioned other factors. Nevertheless, it was quite clear that the ownership of the company in question was a factor. When we attempted to obtain further information from him to make clear just what he had said, he repeated

... as I have just said, the determining factor with regard to the technology transfer was not ownership ...

However, that still leaves ownership as a factor in that reply.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us clearly today whether or not the ownership of Bristol Aerospace Limited, Winnipeg, by Rolls Royce was or was not a factor in the decision?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I really cannot add very much to what I said yesterday. The determining factor was the transfer of technology and the fact that one of those companies manufactures aircraft and the other does not. I am sure all of us are very pleased that the company that does manufacture aircraft and has been successful in the bid for the contract is a Canadian-owned company.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, that does not answer the question. The question is: Was the ownership a factor or was it not; yes or no?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Molgat: Very well, we can conclude that the ownership was a factor and that the minister agrees with what was said in the other place. Clearly, the ownership was a factor.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, at the same time, I placed on the record the statement made at the time of the request for proposals, which was that proposals would be evaluated, and I quote again:

... to the extent of giving consideration to socio-economic benefits that will include such terms as Canadian design, development and Canadian manufacturing, engineering and support personnel that will be used by the contractor.

And I repeat what I said yesterday:

In this context both Minister McInnes and, later, Minister Vézina, along with the Minister of DRIE, were concerned to maximize the socio-economic benefits and the nature of technology transfer to consolidate and strengthen the Canadian aerospace industry. As a result, both Minister McInnes and, later, Minister Vézina made submissions to the Treasury Board recommending Canadair of Montreal.

Senator Molgat: Does it say anywhere in there "Canadian ownership"?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it says "Canadian aerospace industry"; it says "Canadian manufacturing, engineering and support personnel"; it says "Canadian" at several places in the statement I have just made that accompanied the request for proposals.

I hope that the honourable senator, notwithstanding his disappointment that the contract did not go to a firm that is located in Manitoba, will have gained some satisfaction from the fact that the contract did go to a Canadian-owned company that will be able to make the maximum use of the technology in developing and maintaining a Canadian aerospace industry.

Senator Molgat: I thank the minister for his reply. I might say that if he is using the word "disappointment" in relation to Manitobans, if he spoke to any Manitobans the feeling is one of absolute outrage; total and complete outrage. In fact, he need only check with his neighbour to the left who himself stated that he was disappointed with this government.

It is now clear that ownership was a factor. We at least have that answer settled—that is, this government operates on the basis of ownership. Will that, then, be the policy of the government henceforth in its contracting procedures with foreign firms?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I said in the Senate yesterday, there were two excellent bids from two excellent groups of companies. Those two companies were very close in terms of the technical evaluation and exceedingly close in terms of price. That being the case, the government made a judgment call on other factors, including—and especially including—the matter of technology transfer.

Senator Molgat: And, obviously, the question of ownership. My honourable friend then agrees with the statements made by the Honourable John Crosbie when he said many other factors went into the decision. He noted that Canadair is Canadian owned while Bristol is foreign owned. Now that we have established that clearly, could my honourable friend tell me where the matter of the cost of technology transfers now stands?

I ask that because there were statements made yesterday that, indeed, Canadair will have to purchase that information, or the Government of Canada will have to purchase that information, at an additional cost of some $30 million in order to transfer that technology to Canadair. Could the leader tell us something about that situation?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we have not been able to obtain a copy of the report the honourable senator is referring to, but in the meanwhile I can say that my information is that the reference to an extra $30 million the government will have to pay with respect to technology transfer for having awarded this contract to Canadair is incorrect.

Senator Argue: Too low!

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Could the leader tell us whether or not the usual procedures used in tendering are going to be followed in the future?

I ask that question because the member for Calgary East is reported to have said—well, not only reported to have said; some senators saw him say it on television—that this element of technology transfer, and all that good stuff, is a lot of nonsense, that it was a political decision.

If this was a political decision, and this is the way the Conservative government comes out when it makes a political decision, how are places like western Canada and the maritimes, which also had a bid in for this contract, going to be treated in the future?

Is the future procedure going to be based on so-called socio-economic factors, and other things, and, if so, how will firms in western Canada ever be successful in obtaining contracts from the government if there is competition from other areas, even though all of the other factors that usually go into tendering are in favour of a firm located in western Canada—as was the case in this situation—or in the maritimes?

Senator Murray: What my honourable friend refers to as "all of the other factors" were exceedingly close in the respective evaluations of the two final bidders. The government, in those circumstances, made a judgment call based on certain criteria.

With respect to the question regarding socio-economic criteria, in the past they have been applied to the benefit of various regions of Canada and in the national interest, as they will be in the future.

Senator Olson: That is exactly what I want the leader to explain. I should like the leader to tell us what these so-called other criteria are so that people living in western Canada or people living in the maritimes can know in advance, or while they are preparing their bids, whether they have a hope of winning, or whether, when it gets into the hands of this government, this government will bend all of the criteria to suit its own political needs, as the member for Calgary East stated yesterday. At least, he was honest about it, and I give him credit for that.

The leader is trying to drum up a bunch of lame excuses for what the politics of the situation demanded his party do. If he would say that that was the case, then, at least, people putting in bids would know in advance. I ask him now whether the government is going to let people know what the terms and conditions are going to be or what criteria are going to be used in awarding contracts. The leader told us at least half a dozen times that it was close, but Bristol won, except when one brings into play these other factors that are so nebulous.

Those putting in tenders did not understand, first of all, these other factors existed, much less what it would take to meet them. In the future, will people who are intending to bid know what the so-called socio-economic and other factors are in advance so that they can prepare their bids accordingly?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have already read into the record once today, and once yesterday, what some of those factors were and are.

Senator Olson: But you did not indicate how you evaluated those factors, and I wonder if you could do that so that the people making the bids can know.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: People know what dollars and cents are, but we do not know how you evaluate these so-called "other factors." There are some members of the Tory caucus who are saying that this technology transfer that the minister has relied on so heavily is—I have to think of a polite term, because the one that comes out does not fall into the category of parliamentary language—phoney, which is about the most descriptive word that I can think of at the moment.

Senator Murray: Well, if the former Minister of State for Economic Development thinks it is a phoney argument to invoke the need to develop and to maintain a prosperous Canadian aerospace industry in this country—

Senator Frith: Now we are getting at it.

Senator Murray: —then he is very seriously mistaken.

Senator Olson: Referring to "maintaining or promoting a prosperous aerospace industry in this country," would Winnipeg be considered to be part of this country?

Senator Murray: Yes, honourable senators, and as I have explained to the honourable senator, unfortunately for Winnipeg, the company that was best equipped to make use of the technology transfer in the development and maintenance of a prosperous aerospace industry in this country is located in Montreal. That decision was taken by the government on a judgment call, all other things being fairly equal, on the basis of the criteria that I have outlined.

Senator Frith: And you will give us details.

Senator Olson: All of which was done against the judgment of the so-called "technical people" who were asked to examine the details of the bids that were made.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: The important part is: Are any prospective bidders—whether it is for ship, or aircraft, or whatever—going to face this kind of evaluation of criteria in the future? That is what they need to know.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the honourable senator will be aware that it is almost always stated that the lowest bid or any tender is not necessarily accepted by the government.

Senator Frith: Or the best, apparently.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator must agree that there are reasons for putting such a stipulation in.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator also knows that when the lowest tender is not accepted, there are almost invariably some good, solid, sensible reasons, and that is what I am trying to get out of the minister. I want to know what they are and how the evaluation is done from time to time. Perhaps what is behind us is behind us, but if the extremities of this country such as the maritimes and the west are to participate in the business that is done by the government—whether it is in military matters or otherwise—they have a right to know in advance how the tenders are going to be evaluated. That is what I am trying to get him to explain. I don't know why he dances around it; if this is an embarrassment, so be it! But, at least, such firms need to know how they should bid so that they can put forward a bid that is evaluated the way they expect it to be. In the past they thought it was on technical competence and the dollars and cents required. Now, obviously, that criterion was set aside. Therefore, can we know what the new rules will be?

Senator Murray: Well, honourable senators, I invite the honourable senator to make that speech on a Notice of Inquiry, or perhaps even during the Throne Speech debate.

Senator Frith: It won't help; he won't get the answer. In other words, you will not get the answer.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, the minister has repeated again that Canadair was awarded the contract because of the advantage it had in that it could make better use of the technology transfer—that was one of the factors, apart from the ownership factor, which we have now settled as being one of the factors. Could he explain, then, this statement which I will read:

The National Defence document also refutes Treasury Board President Robert de Cotret's claim that Canadair can use the technology acquired from the U.S. and the Bristol partners for other aircraft it manufactures such as the Challenger executive jet and its waterbomber, and even for manufacturing automobiles.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know what my honourable friend is reading from. Perhaps he could identify the document.

Senator Molgat: I am reading from The Ottawa Citizen of November 5, 1986, and the headline is "Govt. knew of Canadair deal's extra cost."

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, yesterday the Deputy Leader of the Opposition asked a similar question. It was, at any rate, a question which tried to get at, in some more specific way, this question of technology transfer, and a reply, which is being prepared, will be tabled shortly. It will not be today, but, I hope, it will be tomorrow.

ENERGY

PRICE OF CANADIAN GAS TO U.S. CONSUMERS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether it is true that, because of government policy, U.S. consumers will be able to obtain Canadian gas more cheaply than will Canadians. The answer that the Leader of the Government gave consisted of a quotation from the statement made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in the other place.

I undertook to study that answer to see if I could find in it a direct answer to my question which was quite simply: Will Canadians be paying more for Canadian gas than Americans?

The reason I asked the question is because I recall that in the election campaign, in very plain words, the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Conservative Party, said that under no circumstances would deregulation, or any other policy of the government, have that result.

In studying the response given, which is the statement by the minister, I find it quite difficult to determine if it contains an answer to my question. At best, I might be able to say that "maybe" would be the answer; not "yes" or "no."

Would the Leader of the Government study the statement and take up with the minister whether I am correct in saying that the answer is, in some cases, "maybe," or am I wrong in that assumption? In other words, can he find out if the consequence of the policy as explained in the statement could mean that Canadians would be paying more for natural gas than Americans?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, we are not trying to pass a law or a regulation to forbid that from happening; what we are saying is that it is highly unlikely, in the context of the policy announced by Mr. Masse the other day, that it will happen.

Senator Frith: That is fine. I would not have used the word "highly," but "unlikely, but possible" seems to be what is being said.

INDUSTRY

SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION—FUTURE OF PLANT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I have a question respecting Sydney Steel Corporation, its present situation and its future.

I am sure the Leader of the Government in the Senate is aware of some announcements and statements made in the past few days which caused a great deal of concern to the steelworkers, their families, the community in general and, indeed, to the whole province of Nova Scotia.

Honourable senators will be aware that the previous government, in cooperation with the Government of Nova Scotia, completed the first phase of the overall modernization of Sydney Steel Corporation in 1984. Over the past two years the present Government of Canada, in collaboration with the Government of Nova Scotia, has made several announcements with respect to the second phase of the modernization program.

Now we are greeted with headlines which state, for instance, in the Cape Breton Post of October 31, "Sysco's future clouded again"; and in the Chronicle-Herald of November 1, 1986, "Sysco plans threatened..." according to the president of the Steelworkers' Union. Another headline in yesterday's Chronicle-Herald reads "Studies may lead to Sysco closing." I am sure that honourable senators will appreciate how alarming this kind of speculation and news is to the people in that area. The story under that headline begins:

Premier John Buchanan has confirmed reports that the $157-million Sysco modernization plan is on hold for further market studies that could eventually result in the closing of the aging steel plant.

Further on in the article, it states:

As recently as last month Mr. Buchanan met with Industry Minister Michel Cote to work out details of the agreement that was to cost the province $47.2 million while the remaining $110 million would be picked up by the federal government.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us what new information has surfaced in the very recent past—within the last two months—against the background of the positive discussions that apparently had been held between the minister of DRIE and the provincial premier that would lead to these new market studies?

• (1420)

Senator Graham: My understanding, honourable senators, is that the contract that was awarded by the provincial and federal governments had to do with the design work with respect to the second phase of modernization and that it had nothing to do with market studies. I would, indeed, be interested in knowing, if there are market studies—and quite obviously there are—whether they are part of that design plan or whether they are separate studies being done by another agency on behalf of the provincial and federal governments.

Senator Murray: I will try to obtain more information on the matter, but my present information is that it is a comprehensive business plan, including updated market studies, that is being developed by Sysco.

Senator Graham: Could the Leader of the Government indicate when we might have that information?

Senator Murray: I will try to find out, honourable senators.

Senator Graham: Could the Leader of the Government bring to us a comprehensive clarifying statement so as to relieve the anxiety of the steelworkers, their families and, indeed, the community in that part of Canada? I refer to another article which appeared in the October 31 edition of the Chronicle-Herald, which states:

Revelations that former DRIE minister Sinclair Stevens may have been canvassing the markets for a buyer for the provincially owned Sydney Steel Corp. (Sysco) have caught senior politicians—both federal and provincial—off guard.

It goes on to say:

The possible sale of Sysco surfaced Wednesday in Toronto during hearings of the Parker inquiry into conflict-of-interest allegations against Mr. Stevens, the former DRIE minister who quit his post last spring.

It was certainly news to the people of Nova Scotia, the people of Atlantic Canada, and, indeed, to all of us that the government was attempting to sell off Sydney Steel.

In light of all of the comments that have been made and in light of these revelations, I wonder whether the Leader of the Government could give us a clarifying statement.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as my friend knows, the Sydney Steel plant is not ours to sell off. The report to which he refers is, indeed, news to a great many people, and he will have seen the statements attributed to the Honourable Michel Côté, as well as to the Nova Scotia Development Minister, Mr. Thornhill, to the effect that they have never heard of such a thing.

So much for the latter part of the honourable senator's question. Concerning the first part of his question as to what reassurance I and the Government of Canada can bring to the people of Cape Breton with regard to the future of the plant, I believe that question should more properly be directed to the owners of the plant or the Government of Nova Scotia.

The honourable senator has stated the chronology very accurately. The first phase of the modernization was undertaken in the context of a federal-provincial agreement. Last February the present government signed an agreement for the second phase of the modernization in an amount, if I recall correctly, of $157 million, of which 70 per cent is being paid by the federal government.

To the best of our knowledge and information, the basic engineering work on phase two of that modernization is going ahead. It is not on hold.

Senator Frith: Why not just call tenders and don't mention the fact that you don't own the place?

Senator Graham: The Premier of Nova Scotia has stated that the market studies are being carried out at the request of the federal government. That is why we are asking for clarification from federal authorities.

Senator Murray: I appreciate that point, and will obtain all of the information on the matter that I can.

TRANSPORT

CLOSING OF CN SHOPS, MONCTON

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I am sure that the Leader of the Government will not be surprised if I ask a question concerning the CN shops in Moncton. We know that the premier, MPs and others have been trotting around the country trying to find a solution to the problem. Can the Leader of the Government inform the Senate if there is anything new on the subject?

[Senator Graham.]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am afraid not. The Premier of New Brunswick and the federal Minister of Transport met yesterday afternoon. My colleague advises me that there is still hope that the deadline to which the honourable senator referred the other day has been extended, although no new deadline has been set. No decision has been made to terminate the whole process. Those involved are awaiting developments. The minister says that probably it would not be helpful to make any further comments at this time when discussions are proceeding among the various players.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I am sure that the Leader of the Government, as well as those of us in New Brunswick, knows how our premier hates to leave his province. I thought that the Leader of the Government might have some information that would enable our premier to return home quickly.

Having said that, we read and hear a lot about the $1.3 billion contract that has been awarded to Canadair to create new jobs. I am glad that new jobs will be created in many parts of the country. However, the people of New Brunswick do not speak out as loudly, perhaps, as those in western Canada, but New Brunswickers are really concerned about the CN shops. It seems that the Minister of Transport has really made up his mind that the government will not interfere—which is to say that if CGE does not come there—the shops will be closed, CN will pull out and there will be no repair work done in Moncton.

The people of my province have known for a long time that while there was nothing written in stone, there was, over a period of many years, an understanding that 20 per cent of the repair work for CN would be done in Moncton, 40 per cent in Montreal and 40 per cent in Winnipeg.

People of my province realize that traffic has gone down, that the repair work is less, that the repair work required in the Atlantic provinces to serve the region was allocated according to the standing agreement of 20-40-40. Why should that agreement not hold? If 20 per cent of the required repair work meant 200 jobs, then the people of New Brunswick would understand. But I am afraid that even the Prime Minister will have a hard time explaining to the people of New Brunswick how the government can allow CN to close those shops. I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate can enlighten us on the subject.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know what the government or CN could have done that has not been done with regard to the present situation involving CGE and the refusal of one or two unions to accept the arrangements that were proposed. As to the larger question, that is really a matter for debate.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, many people around the Moncton area are convinced that, in fact, CN wants to close the shop, that CN is hoping that CGE will never come to Moncton. That is the feeling. The people who are now working in the hump yard in Moncton have been told by CN that 150 jobs will be transferred from the shops to the hump yard. I talked to people who are presently working in the hump yard, and they told me that there is not enough work for the people who are already there. What it means is that, yes, 150 people who have the seniority will be transferred from the shop to the hump yard, but probably 150 people in the hump yard will be laid off. If one sits down and looks at the possible logic from CN's perspective, it makes sense. It would be easier for CN if CGE did not come to Moncton at all. That is what people are concerned about. I think that if CN had been told from the outset that it would not be allowed to close those shops in Moncton, we might have had a different story here today.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, so far as I am aware, there is only one thing standing between us and a successful conclusion to the matter, and that is the refusal of a couple of unions to agree to the arrangements that were proposed.

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGED ABUSE OF MINISTERIAL DISCRETION

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Our new Minister of State for Immigration has been going to great lengths to bring into Canada a very undesirable character, a man who has a very long and very serious criminal record in Europe.

Senator Guay: One of his friends!

Senator Lucier: We are not talking about minor offences. He has committed some very serious offences.

Senator Murray: What was that comment?

Senator Guay: I said that it was one of his friends, and I shall repeat it, if you like.

Senator Murray: Thank you.

Senator Lucier: My question to the minister is: Is this a new policy that this government is following? Do we not have enough good people trying to get into Canada that we have to go around Europe recruiting crooks? Three different ministers have turned down this person because of his unsavoury character and because of his criminal record. Three different ministers—two Conservative and one Liberal—have turned him down. The deputy minister has said that under no circumstances should this person be allowed into Canada. The minister has said that he does not care what anybody says, that he is bringing him in. I wonder if there are a couple of open cans of tuna around here, because this is starting to smell a little bit fishy. I wonder whether the minister has an explanation for what is taking place.

by this government or by the minister. He entered Canada in 1979.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, that is a pretty slippery answer to a very serious question. I think that this is a serious matter, and I do not think that it will go away quite that easily. In fact, I am going to see that it does not go away so easily. I wonder if the Prime Minister is trying to fill the new prison in his riding.

It seems to me that the matter is serious. Many good people are trying to get into Canada to contribute to Canada. The last thing we need is a bunch of crooks from other countries here and a minister who is going out of his way to accommodate them. Even one of the minister's officials has indicated that he or she is against him on this matter. I would like to know from the government leader if anything is going to be done about this, or are we just going to hope that it will go away like the other things done by this government?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know what information the honourable senator has about this applicant that he has not read in the public media, but it is obvious that he is looking for an argument on the subject. I suggest that during the Throne Speech debate, or by way of Notice of Inquiry, he make a speech about this matter, at which time, perhaps, Senator Guay can be called upon to bring his information to our attention and to defend the statements that he made about the connection between the person in question and my colleague.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, obviously, I have no information other than what I have read in the press. That is why I am asking the Leader of the Government in the Senate to bring some information forward on the matter. Who are we dealing with here, and what are the reasons for this man being allowed into this country and allowed to stay here when we have good people who are not allowed to stay here? That is the kind of information I would like to have brought forward. I wonder if the minister would give me an undertaking that he will bring that information to us.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the honourable senator has finally asked a couple of questions, but he has also made quite a number of assertions. It is those assertions that I suggest he may want to put to the test of debate in this house on the policy of the government, the procedures that are followed and the discretion which is allowed to the minister. As I said, at that time our friend, Senator Guay, can come forward to defend the statements that he has made about my colleague.

Senator Guay: I do not have to defend anything.

Senator Argue: This is the place to put the question.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I appreciate the lecture, and now I would like the information.

NANAIMO HARBOUR COMMISSION

INQUIRY INTO MANAGEMENT AND OPERATION

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. My question relates to a telegram from the chairman of the Nanaimo Harbour Commission dated October 28. It was directed to the Honourable John Crosbie, Minister of Transport. This telegram requested the minister to authorize an investigation into allegations and charges made by certain of the harbour board's commissioners. In the chairman's view, the existing situation is prejudicial to the exercise of the commission's function and it is also prejudicial to the commission's reputation. He has, therefore, suspended further meetings of the commission pending the report of an inquiry. From my knowledge of the circumstances, I concur with the chairman's request and confirmed this by letter to the Minister of Transport dated October 31.

Honourable senators, I apologize for the preamble, but I know that all of us are not familiar with harbours commissions, and I wanted to make the point clear. My question is: Can the Leader of the Government confirm that it is the intention of the Minister of Transport to authorize an immediate inquiry to determine and report on the facts of this matter?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I did have a note on this matter. My friend was kind enough to send me notice of the question. I cannot find my note. Let me try to recollect what I have been told about the matter. First, the commission is an autonomous body that is granted very considerable authority by statute, and the minister really does not interfere in its operations.

Second, with regard to some of the specific accusations or statements that have been made on the administration of that port, the Minister of Transport advises me that all of the studies and examinations of the financial administration and so forth lend no credibility whatsoever to the accusations. I might also add that the minister does not have the authority to launch the kind of investigation that my honourable friend recommends.

Senator Bell: Thank you. I have a supplementary question or two, but perhaps I could deal first with the last point made by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I would suggest that although the harbour commissions exist very much at arm's length from the government by the will of Parliament, there is also a strong provision that is part of the Harbour Commissions Act that they report to the Minister of Transport. In other words, that he is responsible in right of the people of Canada, through Parliament, for the activities of the harbour commissions.

Also, I would like to quote section 2, Part I, of the Inquiries Act, Chapter I-13 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. This is pretty general, but it would certainly give the minister the power to conduct an inquiry. It says:

[Senator Lucier.]

The Governor in Council may, whenever he deems it expedient, cause inquiry to be made into and concerning any matter connected with the good government of Canada or the conduct of any part of the public business thereof.

I realize that that is very general. However, considering that the minister is responsible to the people of Canada, through Parliament, for the activities of the harbour commissions, I think an inquiry would be in order.

I must say at this point that I feel very strongly about this matter. The Nanaimo Harbour Commission is probably a flagship of the harbour commissions. It has never been in the red and has had very prudent management and excellent public-spirited citizens serving on the board. Therefore, when we were able to change the Canada Ports Act and set up the more autonomous ports right across Canada, I was delighted, because I was using the Nanaimo Harbour Commission as a model.

I would, therefore, ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to convey to the minister, in view of the urgent circumstances, the necessity of accepting the responsibility and appointing his own inquiry under the auspices of someone who will bring him the facts of this impossible situation as it now exists.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Senator Bell is a great deal closer to the situation in Nanaimo than I am, or, indeed, even than Mr. Crosbie is. I want to say that I appreciate her advice on this matter and that we will take it into consideration.

However, I must say that on the face of it there does not seem to be anything to warrant the appointment of an inquiry under the Public Inquiries Act. I have now received the notes I was looking for and I find that, subsequent to the receipt of the telex from the chairman, Mr. Stroyan of the Department of Transport's Internal Audit Section was asked to conduct an independent, third party review of both the financial statements and management audit. That review has concluded that there is no evidence of financial wrong-doing.

While I am on my feet, I simply want to confirm that the harbour commission elects its chairman in accordance with the Harbour Commissions Act and bylaws. They engage a port manager and other staff and they establish travel policy. None of these activities is subject to ministerial direction, Treasury Board approval or public service guidelines. What the commission is required to do, according to the act, is to keep accounts of all the moneys borrowed, received and expended by it and to account therefor to the minister annually within three months of the end of each fiscal year. Departmental officials also conduct an on-site management review of the commission's operations on an annual basis.

Honourable senators, all I can say is that on the basis of all the information we have no credence is lent to any of the accusations that have been made about the chairman and about the management of the place, and we do not see that the appointment of an inquiry under the Public Inquiries Act is justified at this time. There may, however, be factors that we do not know about or are not taking sufficiently into consideration, and we will be glad, therefore, to consider the honourable senator's proposal.

Senator Bell: I want to thank the honourable leader for his reply. I have just one more point to make in relation to his last remarks. Paragraph 2.1(1)(b) of Part III of the Harbour Commissions Act talks about a port system that is efficient. Section 2.2 of Part III of that same act states that:

It is the responsibility of the Minister to undertake the necessary measures to achieve the objective of the national ports policy.

I point out to the Leader of the Government that this all fits together, and I thank him for his response. I also hope that he is right and that this situation will work out.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, yesterday the American Congressional elections were transformed into a tidal wave that swept into office Democratic majorities in both the House of Representatives and the Senate, led by Democratic senators and representatives who campaigned strongly on protectionist measures that will affect Canadian exports to that marketplace.

It would now appear that the "fast track" negotiations for the bilateral trade talks which terminate in March of 1987 will have been swept away or drowned by this tidal wave, isolating the President of the United States and making him a lame duck in the days and months ahead.

Yesterday, and previously, the Leader of the Government in the Senate advised us that the government has no contingent plans for strategic withdrawal from the current bilateral negotiations. I now ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate what new strategies or points of leverage, or what specific means has the Government of Canada considered in order to persuade Congressional leaders in the Senate and the House of Representatives to stop or defer the proposed omnibus trade bill which is being suggested as one of the priority measures by the majority Democratic leader, Senator Burr.

Having said that, however, I simply want to say, first of all, that I think it would be quite wrong to prejudge the conduct of a new Congress. Second, the Reagan administration has committed itself to these negotiations. I cannot understand how my honourable friend can refer to President Reagan as a lame duck. I must say it would be premature to write off President Reagan, especially when you examine his ratings in the United States. I think experience in the past six years has shown that a couple of telecasts by the "Great Communicator" are enough to send a great many politicians scrambling.

The third point I wish to make is that the Congress of the United States has approved the holding of these negotiations and the "fast track" procedure. For our part, we will continue to try to negotiate a treaty which will be the best, the biggest and most comprehensive trade arrangement we can get with the United States. By the way, the purpose of undertaking these negotiations is to render our country less vulnerable—indeed, invulnerable—to such passing phenomena as Congressional elections.

Senator Argue: They will come every two years; don't worry about that!

Senator Grafstein: The President of the United States is, indeed, a great communicator. His words impress all of us, but his deeds recently have not matched his words. He has talked about being behind a liberalized international trading order, yet he has refused to veto the current imposition of import duties against Canadian softwood lumber imported into the United States. Obviously, he has been motivated by the changing mood and changing public opinion in the United States.

I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he would give some hard consideration in his role as a cabinet minister to examining carefully now, as opposed to next March, what type of strategic withdrawal can take place before there is a backlash or a reaction to the withdrawal which will ultimately take place in March.

Senator Murray: I must say that I do not know what the honourable senator is talking about. With great respect, I am not sure he does. I do not understand, first of all, the significance of March 1987. The "fast track," as I recall, will take us through to January 1987, ultimately.

Senator Grafstein: My understanding is that the first "fast track" negotiation period is in March or April of next year.

Senator Murray: Let me tell my honourable friend that we are looking forward to having our negotiators initial an agreement by the end of September 1988.

Senator van Roggen: September 1987.

Senator Murray: I am sorry, September 1987.

AIR CANADA

FUTURE OF CROWN CORPORATION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and relates to the government policy on Air Canada.

Some two years ago or less, the Prime Minister stated that Air Canada was not for sale. Yesterday the Honourable John Crosbie, Minister of Transport, said that the sale of the airline is being considered.

My questions are: Was the Prime Minister not telling us the truth two years ago? Is Mr. Crosbie wrong now? Has the Prime Minister changed his mind?

Senator Frith: Take your pick.

Senator Molgat: So, Mr. Crosbie is wrong, then?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, if my friend were considering the future of Air Canada, or of another crown corporation like it, and trying to look down the road, I suppose one of the scenarios that he might envision would be the privatization of some or all companies such as that.

It seems to me to be in accordance with good public policy practice to consider all of the possibilities that might arise. But, I repeat, Air Canada is not for sale. We have not asked for offers from potential buyers nor would we entertain any offers at this moment.

GUY FAWKES' DAY

381st ANNIVERSARY OF GUNPOWDER PLOT

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, before Orders of the Day are called, I wish to recall to the memory of honourable senators that 381 years ago today one of the earliest and most colourful conspirators—or should I say terrorists?—in western society almost succeeded in blowing up the Houses of Parliament at Westminster. Guy Fawkes and his associates were caught literally red-handed with a match about to be put to the fuse, hence:

Please to remember

The Fifth of November,

Gunpowder, treason and plot;

We see no reason

Why gunpowder treason

Should ever be forgot.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

NOTICE OF MEETING OF SUBCOMMITTEE ON BUDGETS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a matter that is much less momentous.

An Hon. Senator: Much less explosive.

Senator Frith: Yes, much less explosive. Incidentally, while we are trying to purify language, I would say that they were caught "figuratively" red-handed, not "literally."

Honourable senators, I have been asked by the Chairman of the Subcommittee on Budgets of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration to point out that that subcommittee is to meet to deal with important business relating to committee budgets when the Senate rises today. Because there is Royal Assent scheduled later this day, I have been asked to assure the members of that subcommittee that the subcommittee will convene when the Senate rises to await the arrival of the Deputy of Her Excellency.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

ORAL REPORT ON OASIS NETWORK

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have been requested by the members of the Standing Rules and Orders Committee to present an oral report to the Senate respecting the OASIS Parliamentary Network.

Honourable senators may be wondering why I am making this statement, since the OASIS Parliamentary Network is not the responsibility of the Rules Committee. By way of explanation, last year the members of that committee proposed that the Senate accept a rule regarding the audio distribution of Senate and committee proceedings. That was referred to the committee and the committee feels we should advise the Senate in that regard.

The Senate has been assigned two channels on the OASIS Parliamentary Network which provide information on Senate sittings and committee meetings. These are channels 080 for the English language, and 081 for the French language.

This service is designed to complement written committee notices which are distributed to all honourable senators' offices, and it is expected, generally, that any changes will appear on the OASIS screens well before the same amendments can be delivered in written form. I am advised that these channels will shortly carry the same live audio feed from the chamber during sittings that now goes out to various media subscribers. As honourable senators are aware, the Senate added rule 109 A. to our rules which permits the broadcast of public proceedings in the Senate and Senate committees through the use of audio feed facilities which have been installed for that purpose.

In addition, we have been informed that OASIS installation in the Victoria Building will be completed by the end of this month.

The Clerk of the Senate will be sending a letter to all honourable senators to inform them of the Senate OASIS channels.

THE ALLIANCE NATIONALE CONSOLIDATED ACT, 1945

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Michel Cogger moved the second reading of Bill S-3, to amend and repeal the Alliance Nationale Consolidated Act, 1945.

He said: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words in support of Bill S-3, an Act to amend and repeal The Alliance Nationale Consolidated Act, 1945. The purpose of this bill is to facilitate the amalgamation of that life insurance company with another insurance company also based in Québec, the Industrial Life Insurance Company.

Honourable senators, the changes taking place in the life insurance sector are obliging company directors to monitor the situation very carefully and react too quickly to changes as they occur. In fact, in order to protect the interests of their members, companies must maintain and invest their assets, while directors must ensure that their company is able to consistently offer its customers a first-class product, at competitive prices, while maintaining a sound financial position.

Because of these considerations, the directors of Alliance Mutual Life Insurance Company and Industrial Life Insurance Company at special meetings of their respective boards of directors held on June 30 of this year, voted unanimously in favour of the proposal to amalgamate Alliance with Industrial.

The proposal is to be implemented in two separate stages. The first stage consists of modifying Alliance's charter, so that it can be governed by the Quebec Insurance Act instead of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. The second stage consists in the amalgamation itself, in accordance with the provisions of the Quebec Insurance Act by which the amalgamated company will be governed.

To accomplish the first stage, members of Alliance first had to vote in favour of a change in the company's charter and authorize the change of jurisdiction. Members voted almost unanimously in favour of these changes at a special general meeting held on September 30 of this year. Prior to the meeting, all members had received in the mail a letter explaining the amalgamation proposal, with a proxy form on which they could indicate their position. The entire process was monitored and co-ordinated by representatives from the federal Department of Insurance. Furthermore, to ensure that members' rights were protected, the company sought a report by an independent actuary. The report shows that both companies are, relatively speaking, nearly identical in financial strength. Membership dues at Alliance were set and guaranteed for a minimum period of three years, which is unusual as far as current procedures go. However, the purpose of this guarantee was to ensure that Alliance members would maintain their acquired rights.

To complete this first stage it is necessary to pass special legislation to authorize the change of jurisdiction, as approved by members at a special meeting, because the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act does not cover this kind of situation. As a matter of fact, the merger itself, which is the second stage, cannot be finalized until the federal Parliament has adopted this bill.

The text of the bill was the subject of discussions between the administrative services responsible for implementing the law of Quebec, and the Senate legal advisers and both parties are happy with it. The federal Department of Insurance has examined and approved the contents of this measure.

As to the merger itself, Alliance and Industrial Life members endorsed the principle during special general meetings held last September 30, provided of course the Alliance charter can be transferred, so that the merger might indeed take place pursuant to the Quebec insurance legislation.

Once the bill has been adopted by both Houses of Parliament, the insurance company resulting from the merger will be called the Industrial-Alliance Life Insurance Company. The assets of the new company will amount to roughly $2.5 billion and the surplus will exceed $250 million, which attests to the company's sound financial situation. The value of the insurance portfolio of the new company once the merger is finalized will be in excess of $25 billion. The size of the new company will be such that it will be in a position to do more business owing to its sound financial situation, something which will give added protection to its members. The new company will rank about fifteenth in Canada.

Honourable senators, the bill submitted for your approval stems from the unanimous agreement of both boards of directors to merge. It is also the duly expressed will of the members of the Alliance and those of Industrial Life. The management of both companies are convinced that the merger will mean better protection for their policyholders.

Honourable senators, these are the few remarks I wanted to make in support of this bill. I hope honourable senators will acknowledge the validity and merit of the representations made on behalf of the companies and give quick approval to this legislative measure.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, under rule 93 such a bill must go to a committee, and any representations in the Senate against such a bill stand referred to such a committee. I believe that we should send this bill to committee. The sponsor of the bill and those who have asked him to sponsor it have done all their homework. They have had the necessary meetings, they have worked with the federal Department of Insurance, and they have had an independent actuary's report. The need for our intervention or action, as Senator Cogger has explained, turns on the fact that the merger depends on the Alliance Company changing from federal to Quebec jurisdiction so that they can merge with a company that is already under Quebec jurisdiction. I think that the committee will find, as I have said, that the homework has all been done. Certainly, listening to Senator Cogger, and on the basis of material that he forwarded to me, I am sure that that is so. So I recommend, honourable senators, that we give this bill second reading now, and then the sponsor may wish to move to refer it to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Cogger, bill referred to Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Cogger, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, for an Address to Her Excellency the Governor General in reply to Her Speech at the opening of the Session.—(Honourable Senator Petten). (6th day of resuming debate).

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Bosa.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I am pleased to take part in the debate on the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. It is an established tradition in this chamber to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the motion, Senators Cogger and Barootes. In doing so, honourable senators, I hope they do not take it personally if in my remarks I say that I do not share the views they have expressed about the substance of the Speech from the Throne.

Honourable senators, it has long been a tradition that the government of the day outlines its legislative agenda in the Speech from the Throne. It has also been an accepted practice that such speeches remain fairly general in nature. However, in its most recent effort the present government seems to have confused a statement of intention with vague generalities. The government wants to be all things to all people and, in the final analysis, offers very little of substance to anyone.

There are very real and concrete problems facing Canadians in this era of increased international economic competition and national, social and economic dislocation. Indeed, economic dislocation is very much the consequence of international competition, and how we prepare to manage and meet this competition and its attendant dislocations will go a long way in determining our future socio-economic viability as a nation.

When this government came to power, it ostensibly made job creation its major priority. Today there are still 1,221,000 Canadians unable to find work. While these numbers are tragic enough, what is equally disconcerting is the regional basis of Canadian unemployment.

Currently the unemployment rate in Newfoundland is 20.6 per cent and it ranges between 12.4 to 13.3 per cent in the other maritime provinces. Although other regions are not as badly off, unemployment rates for the rest of the country are far from heartening.

Indeed, increases in employment for the month of September were concentrated solely among persons working part-time. Full-time employment, in fact, decreased with a loss of 17,000 jobs. Those having the greatest difficulty gaining entry to the labour market were, once again, our young people.

Such figures do not bode well. While I do not wish to preach doom, and have always preferred to remain optimistic, I cannot help but wonder about the strains that chronic unemployment is placing on the Canadian family. Part-time employment leaves one with little save a hand-to-mouth existence and is nothing upon which to base a future either for oneself or for one's family.

Structural unemployment seems as severe as ever, and all that the government has offered is a piece of marginal wisdom which states: "... spending more money by itself, has not solved the problem." This is a truism that does not need countering. But what has the government offered as policy? Again, very little.

The government proposes to establish an Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency to co-ordinate all federal development initiatives in the area. This agency is to make fuller use of the expertise available in the Atlantic region and invite the maximum participation of other governments and organizations in the area. An interesting notion at first glance, but skepticism tells me that here we are once again presented with form rather than substance. One sincerely hopes that co-ordination will not come to suffice as an industrial policy for the region.

Honourable senators, dare I say that the maritimes deserve better than another bureaucratic co-ordinating mechanism? People in this part of our country, as elsewhere, require a concrete industrial strategy that is targeted to the achievement of real objectives and gains. We have suffered the consequences of inaction long enough. The time for concrete policies is now. Noah did not wait for the rain to fall before building the ark.

In attempting to improve our economic well-being, the government has put most, if not all, of its hopes on the achievement of a bilateral free trade agreement with the United States. Unfortunately, the adjustment to free trade, if it should ever come, is not likely to be an easy one. Also, by the time we are through with these negotiations, we may have lost more than we have gained. With their recently announced protectionist measures against Canadian goods, the Americans have shown that they view us as they view any other competitor; any notion of a special relationship between us is then little more than wishful thinking.

One can only hope that our southern neighbours are not using these negotiations as a trial run for other bilateral talks. If, as I suspect, this is the case, then the U.S. has a vested interest in extracting from us the best possible deal to serve as a model for future negotiations with other trading partners. As a consequence, therefore, it makes little sense to view the current talks as proceeding on the basis of any mutual interest.

If free trade does come, the need for adequate socio-economic adjustment on our part will be even more intense than is the case now.

When an economy is experiencing significant growth, adjustments to changes in supply, demand and technology can be made with relative ease. Worker mobility is a relatively easy matter, and communities whose major industries are faltering can readily attract new ones. Similarly, firms losing their competitive edge in certain sectors can diversify into

However, in an economy that is stagnant or growing slowly, such adjustment is more problematic. In this instance, workers, communities and firms facing economic changes that erode their competitive position often have no profitable alternative towards which to shift their resources. The initial tendency is to turn to political devices to help ameliorate the situation. But these can only be short-term solutions.

Foreign trade can intensify either of these trends. By providing domestic firms with a wider range of resources and technologies with which to produce and a larger market in which to trade, foreign trade can make a growing economy even more dynamic.

On the other hand, foreign trade can hinder adjustment within a slow economy. Domestic capital may be attracted to foreign markets where economic activity is more vibrant. The unfortunate result is that domestic labour is left behind within large regional pockets of unemployment from which escape is both costly and difficult, while domestic industries that have high fixed costs gradually lose their market share to their foreign rivals. This is a scenario with which we have become all too familiar.

During times of growth, an economy naturally shifts to new industries that generate higher real incomes for its citizens. In Canada, however, a manufacturing sector which once employed more than a quarter of the labour force now employs less than a fifth. Canada is not the only country facing competitive declines in key industries and under-utilized capacity. But all this tells us is that competition, with or without a free trade agreement, is going to increase rather than abate.

Managing the resultant dislocations is no longer a straightforward matter, but it is a problem the government needs to address directly. There are those who argue that a subsidy designed to aid a firm or industry in restructuring itself to be more competitive internationally may simply prolong the agony, while eroding the competitive position of other firms in closely allied industries whose production would otherwise have expanded to fill the gap. It is also argued that workers given assistance for retraining or for finding new jobs may simply treat the funds disbursed as a type of unemployment insurance, thereby avoiding difficult choices or shifting to new lines of work. However, I believe that all those Canadians who suffer socio-economic dislocation ought to have not only our sympathy but also our effective assistance in re-adjusting and re-integrating into our economy.

It is important that we Canadians have a consistent understanding of those areas in which the state can legitimately involve itself. For us Liberals, universal health care, better pensions for the elderly and support for the less fortunate have always been the cornerstones of our social policy. I trust that our Conservative friends will not tamper again with these programs. Social policy and the economy go hand in hand with a stable international political situation, and it is with regard to the international political situation, honourable senators, that I would like to make a few comments.

The recent summit at Reykjavik between the leaders of the superpowers nearly witnessed a major breakthrough in arms negotiations. The particulars of the missed accord need not be repeated here, and some analysts are now saying that it is, perhaps, just as well that, for strategic reasons, the late hour accord did not succeed. While this may very well be true—I do not wish to second guess—it is, nevertheless, heartening to hear that significant progress was made on the question of verification.

This helped to further reinforce the progress made at the 35-nation Conference on Confidence and Security Building Measures and Disarmament in Europe (CDE) in August of this year. On August 19 Oleg Grinevsky, the Soviet chief delegate, announced that his country would permit on-site inspections of troop activities on a much broader basis than was previously agreed to. The announcement was welcomed by all and bodes well for the future.

Indeed, one might suggest that the Reykjavik summit does not represent a lost opportunity, and that the message of Reykjavik is that if we really want arms control, it can be achieved. It is in the interests of all nations that an accord halting nuclear proliferation be reached, and Canada should do all it can in using its good offices to further such conclusion.

Chernobyl brought home to us the devastation that can be wrought by civilian nuclear accidents. A military confrontation would produce a situation beyond our every-day comprehension. The best safeguard against a nuclear military accident is to reduce dramatically, and eventually to eliminate, all nuclear weapons.

I would like to conclude by saying that the future outlook for Canadians is brighter than it is for most. We have a well educated and sophisticated workforce and we have all of the natural resources that any country could wish to have. What we need is a good and competent government to guide us through the future and through such difficult times.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Norman Atkins: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have this opportunity to address this chamber for the first time.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Atkins: I have long been a student of the history of this place, its role in the political and constitutional life of our country and the contribution it has made, is making and can continue to make to Canadian public life. This awareness is enhanced by recollections of my own father, a Nova Scotian from Spencer's Island, Cumberland County, who served in uniform as a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force during the First World War in defence of the institutions and values represented in this chamber.

I would like to begin by conveying my sincere appreciation to the Honourable the Speaker, the officers of this chamber and to honourable senators from all sides for the warm welcome and kindness shown me since my appointment to this place. There are several colleagues to whom I should like to refer by name, given long-standing personal, professional and political associations.

Senators Murray and MacDonald have been friends of mine for many years and I greatly appreciate their role during my swearing-in ceremony, which took place five weeks ago today. I am equally grateful to our deputy leader, Senator Doody, for his friendship over the years. Senator Phillips has been a source of counsel, information and assistance in his capacity as whip on this side of the chamber. Senator Roblin has been a friend since 1959. His record as premier stands on its own merit, and I am proud to have worked on his behalf in Manitoban provincial elections. It was at that time that I first met Senator Nurgitz, who has been a valued a loyal friend ever since. A Liberal opponent on one of those occasions was none other than Senator Molgat, whose service to his party I have long respected.

I am also pleased to acknowledge a number of honourable senators from the maritime provinces whom I have known on either the same or opposing sides during numerous election campaigns. Senators Hicks and Robichaud have served their provinces with distinction and ability, both during their elected careers and as members of this chamber. I have long respected Senator MacEachen. Both my great-grandfather and my grandfather were from Guysborough county in the constituency represented by the former member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso. Senator Graham is yet another Nova Scotian whom I have long known of but only recently had the opportunity to meet.

Senators Macquarrie, Sherwood, Simard and Balfour have been friends and political comrades throughout a number of campaigns. I would also like to acknowledge Senator Flynn, who has been a source of leadership in this chamber for a number of years and who is a friend I have long respected.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Atkins: Last, but certainly not least, Senators Davey, Grafstein and Kirby have long evidenced the fact that it is possible in our democracy to enjoy the company, respect and abilities of opposing partisans of honour and goodwill.

There is one former honourable senator who is also in my thoughts on this occasion. The only other senator to hail from the municipality of Markham, Ontario, was the Honourable David Reesor, who was called to this place by Sir John A. Macdonald 119 years ago last month, in October of 1867. A merchant, newspaper editor and parliamentarian, Senator Reesor remained a member of the Red Chamber for 24 years.

Honourable senators, I cite this predecessor for three reasons. First, I am honoured that Markham should once again enjoy representation in the Senate of Canada. Second, given the fact that David Reesor was a long-standing member of the Reform and Liberal parties, I now believe that the political scales for Markham have been somewhat balanced by the honour so recently bestowed upon me. Third, I hope that this reference will at least correct the mistaken belief held by a number of observers that I am here as a representative of the province of New Brunswick. I hasten to add that this is not to disavow my long and close ties to our great maritime province. Indeed, I have spent a good deal of my time within its borders. I have many relatives there and I even have a farm in that province. I remain particularly interested in its development, both political and otherwise.

While in many ways I regard New Brunswick as my home, Markham, Ontario, is where I live with my family. I am, indeed, honoured to represent in this chamber the people of Markham, as well as the people of the province of Ontario. Since 1793 the people of Markham have taken an active role in the political and economic life of each of Upper Canada, Canada West and the province of Ontario. Indeed, activists within Markham Township took part in the rebellion of 1837, which hastened the introduction of responsible government. Thus, to quote a chapter heading from a book written by Isabel Champion: "Markham has long been home to each of Tories, reformers and rebels."

As one who from time to time has been fitted with each of those labels, it is my pleasure on this occasion to congratulate both the mover and seconder of the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Senators Cogger and Barootes are valued friends for whom I have the greatest respect. I would also like to compliment other honourable senators who have contributed to this debate.

As Senator Hicks pointed out, I am mindful that this day marks the anniversary of Guy Fawkes Day, a significant event in parliamentary history. I am not sure whether the whip had that fact in mind when scheduling my contribution to this debate; and if he was aware of it, I am equally unsure of the lessons that I am to derive as a result. Nevertheless, I can assure honourable senators that my intentions toward this chamber are considerably more honourable than those shown by Mr. Fawkes 381 years ago today.

Honourable senators, the Speech from the Throne conveyed a number of themes of relevance to all Canadians, as our society adapts to a changing world. Three of them hold particular importance for me. First is the continuation of efforts initiated by the current administration to lessen the political, economic and constitutional differences between the regions and the various levels of government in our country. Second is the preservation and enhancement of community and family life through measures designed to promote shared values, equity in all its forms, and compassion for those in need; and, third, meaningful tax reform through the proposed reduction of the income tax burden borne by individual Canadians.

This government has already initiated a number of measures to foster improved relations among the provinces, regions and governments within Canada. Meaningful consultations have been held across a wide range of issues with Canadians representing all interests. Those consultations have led to concerted actions on a number of policy fronts. The Throne Speech pledges to continue this process and to build upon the successes realized in the first two years of the current mandate.

Those efforts at the political level have resulted in a number of measures intended to promote regional economic development. The announced Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is one such initiative that will seek to address the problems so ably discussed by the Honourable Finlay MacDonald in his address to this chamber just one week ago today.

The Throne Speech also evidenced the government's intention to participate more fully in efforts to diversify the economy of the western provinces. The resource-based dependence of that economy has been made all too painfully clear during the past year. Announced commitments in the areas of technology and job creation, to name but two, will serve to complement the other special agricultural initiatives designed to create and maintain a truly national economy.

The Speech from the Throne also demonstrated the government's desire to bring about a truly national Constitution. Discussions are to continue on the matter of aboriginal rights. In addition, the government will continue its efforts to secure the participation of the province of Quebec in the Constitution and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Five years ago today, just a block away from where we are sitting right now, the federal government and nine of the ten provinces struck the agreement whereby the Constitution was patriated and provided with an amending formula and strengthened by the inclusion of the Charter. I know that honourable senators will understand the pride which those of us who had served in common political cause took in the significant role played by my friend, the Honourable William G. Davis, in helping to achieve that agreement in a spirit that reflected his commitment to Canada.

In the context of the bipartisan spirit that often marks debate in this chamber, it is worth noting that just as George Brown walked across the floor to help a Conservative Prime Minister to bring about Confederation, so did Premier Davis and Premier Hatfield, and subsequently a number of their colleagues, set partisanship aside to work with a Liberal administration in pursuit of a new Constitution. I am sure that all Canadians of goodwill wish the government well in its efforts to bring Quebec within the scope of that historic agreement.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Atkins: The second major theme of the Throne Speech of interest to me is the preservation and enhancement of community and family life. The government has reaffirmed its commitment to the shared values upon which our society has long been based. The announced measures designed to combat the illegal use of drugs, pornography, the abuse of women, and to reform the Criminal Code are important elements of the campaign to ensure respect for both the individual and the community.

I hasten to add that I listened with interest to my friend Senator Nurgitz's concern with regard to child abuse and I hope that consideration is being given to the establishment of some type of national child abuse centre.

The Throne Speech also indicated the support of the government for amateur athletes in Canada, and I would be remiss if I did not comment upon the aspect of national sporting life that causes me considerable anxiety. I refer to violence in sport, which has long been accepted by a number of sports organizations, spectators and elements of the media. But it is a phenomenon that entails significant cost to our society, and one of the prime examples of violence in sport is to be found in the boxing ring. I have been concerned about the effects of professional boxing upon the health and long-term well-being of the participants. Numerous studies and opinions have been published that document the injuries, including chronic brain damage, suffered by those engaged in that brutal pastime. Even George Chuvalo has stated that:

There is no way that I would want my kid to be a fighter.
There is nothing as tough as boxing.

It is my sincere belief that the time has come to end professional boxing for the sake of the participants themselves, and I am pleased to hear that the minister, the Honourable Otto Jelinek, is now moving in the whole area of violence in sport.

The government has also indicated its intention to pursue the concept of equity on a number of fronts. Equity for women has been the objective of this administration and the Throne Speech reaffirms this commitment in such areas as child care, wage rates and representation on agencies, boards and commissions. Equity for the handicapped is to be advanced under the Speech from the Throne. Attention to the needs and abilities of the visibly handicapped has been re-awakened by the incredible performance of Rick Hansen. But there are others who are equally deserving of our concern and support. I speak in particular of those with non-visible disabilities such as diabetes, arthritis, epilepsy, haemophilia and any of a number of learning disabilities, and that is to mention just a few. Through my efforts on behalf of Diabetes Canada, I have become increasingly aware of the social, medical and economic costs attached to those conditions that are every bit as deserving of public support as those disabilities that are visible to the naked eye.

Other Canadians who deserve equal treatment in the eyes of the law are those who represent minority ethno-cultural groups. This country has long been a champion of human rights at home, within the Commonwealth and around the world. We must ensure that we ask no more of other countries than we ask of ourselves in this regard. I am pleased to note, therefore, the government's stated commitment to reform of our human rights and refugee determination legislation.

But there are those of us who require not only equal treatment but an extra degree of assistance from a compassionate and generous society. This brings me to the third major theme I have extracted from the Speech from the Throne, provision for those in need. Canadians in legitimate need of economic and other forms of assistance should not be overlooked as our society addresses the issues on the public policy agenda. As has often been stated, a society may be judged in part by the manner in which it cares for the least fortunate of its members. In this light, I am pleased to note the government's proposed initiatives in the area of literacy training, income security for the elderly, older worker adjustment, veterans' affairs, pension reform and aid to victims of violent crimes. The goals contained in the themes I have just examined will have to be pursued in a fiscally responsible manner, given the realities confronting all governments at this point in our history. This fiscal responsibility must be coupled with an equally responsible social conscience on the part of public policy decision-makers. The task of balancing these twin demands is a delicate one at the best of times, but through the application of goodwill, mutual trust and concern for the public interest, I believe that Canadians can successfully address the challenges and opportunities before them.

I believe that there are four factors that can help to guide honourable senators and all concerned Canadians through this process. They have influenced my own actions during my personal and professional life and through the more than 35 political campaigns in which I have been involved. These factors are friendship, loyalty, principle and commitment. Friendship is the gift without which the trappings of political involvement ring distinctly hollow. Those involved in politics have the opportunity to make friends from all parts of Canada and from all walks of life. These friendships can be a source of incentive and support throughout one's life. Loyalty to both friends and colleagues is another quality that will stand us in good stead. It is a source of strength when times are tough and a source of joy when things go well. Loyalty given and returned is the ultimate declaration of friendship and is the element which can sustain that friendship over many years and over great distances. Principles provide the essential reference point for our beliefs, our attitudes and our personal conduct. They help us to chart our own direction, both in life and in politics. People without principle are merely moral weather vanes guided solely by the prevailing winds at any given time.

Finally, I believe that the measure of a person's life is determined by the extent to which one exhibits a commitment to the community by contributing personal time, skills and other support to the preservation and development of our institutions. We in this chamber have the opportunity to make a considerable contribution to the discussions and development of policies contained in the Speech from the Throne. We have the opportunity to assist in the process of shaping Canada's social, economic, political and constitutional future. In so doing, we can play a role in fashioning the society we leave to my sons, to your own family members and to countless young Canadians who hope that there will be a place for them in the Canada of tomorrow. If through our efforts we can in some way help to increase the confidence, optimism and opportunities of the future leaders of this country, then we will have done more than enough to answer those occasional critics who question the role played by this chamber. For my part, I am deeply grateful and honoured to have the opportunity to participate with you in this endeavour.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Doyle, debate adjourned.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the First Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Joint Committee on Official Languages), presented in the Senate on November 4, 1986.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, if I may, I would like to say a few words of explanation as to the rule change proposed by the committee. This matter arises from a message to the Senate received on October 28 from the House of Commons advising us that they had appointed a number of members, 15 in total, to the committee and calling it the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages. Honourable senators may recall that last year we received an omnibus message from the House of Commons asking us to join with them in a number of items, including this one. It involves a change in the name of the committee. The previous committee was called the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, Programs and Policy. That name has been dropped, and there is no other change of which I am aware.

Last year the committee studied the matter and very quickly agreed to this change. It had not agreed to some of the other items in the omnibus message as readily, but this year matters have been separated and there is no problem in accepting the proposal right now. Therefore, our committee recommends that there be a change in the rules to accommodate this procedure.

I might just add in passing that I would hope that the House of Commons in the future will adopt a different method of discussing these matters with the Senate. It seems to me rather forward, frankly, for the House to simply declare a new name for a committee and to appoint members to it without knowing whether or not the Senate agrees to the change. I think, as a matter of courtesy, these matters should be handled by way of discussion with the Senate and, if there is agreement, then the committee can be established and we can proceed in that way. Be that as it may, the committee agrees with and recommends to the Senate the change in the rules.

ASSOCIATION INTERNATIONALE DES PARLEMENTAIRES DE LANGUE FRANÇAISE

FIFTEENTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY, QUÉBEC CITY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin rose pursuant to notice of October 29, 1986:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Fifteenth General Assembly of the Association internationale des parlementaires de langue française, held at Québec City from 6th to 13th September, 1986.

He said: Honourable senators, I have been asked to report on the Fifteenth General Assembly of the Association internationale des parlementaires de langue française, the AIPLF held at Québec City from September 8 to September 13. I am happy to do so on behalf of the chairman of the federal section of the AIPLF and head of the Canadian delegation to the meeting, the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore of the Senate.

Senators Yvette Rousseau and Arthur Tremblay and six members of the House of Commons were also part of our delegation.

In addition to the official activities at the General Meeting, on Saturday, September 5 the AIPLF section of the Ontario legislature was officially established in Toronto. For a number of years, MPPs from Ontario had been attending general and regional AIPLF meetings as observers. The new section is now fully autonomous and enjoys the same rights and privileges as the other Canadian sections in New Brunswick, Quebec and, of course, the federal section.

International delegates to the fifteenth meeting were welcomed in Montreal on Saturday September 5 and Sunday September 6. A sightseeing and cultural program gave our visitors a chance to adjust gradually to the time difference and our Canadian climate.

Delegates were taken to Québec City on Monday, September 8, to stay at the Chateau Frontenac. The old capital gave our guests a warm welcome, and the general organization was excellent. Since there were no sittings of the National Assembly, organizers were able to use the various rooms in the assembly building for the AIPLF meetings.

The opening speeches were by Mr. Pierre Laurin, Speaker of the National Assembly, and Mr. Daouda Sow, President of the AIPLF and Speaker of the National Assembly of Senegal.

AIPLF veterans also had the pleasure of hearing the former federal Minister and Ambassador, but especially founding member of the AIPLF, Mr. Gérard Pelletier, recall the beginnings of our association in Luxemburg 20 years ago.

Need I say again that, on an individual basis, one of the most enriching aspects of such meetings is the personal contact with other parliamentarians whose experience often differs from ours here in Canada.

In a serious vein, honourable senators, I must mention the exemplary conduct of our colleague Senator Asselin. Although he is a long-time member of AIPLF, it certainly does not prevent him from putting up a strong and serious defence, not only of the interests of the Canadian section of AIPLF but also of the broader objectives of the international association. Senator Asselin being a naturally modest man, I would not want to embarrass him with too many compliments. May I simply add that he is following in the footsteps of his predecessors of the Canadian section when he strongly requests that the Paris headquarters of the association be so structured and staffed as to faithfully reflect the AIPLF international character. In this respect, we have yet to internationalize—if I may put it this way—the alternance of officials, particularly the international presidency. An ad hoc committee will consider the matter and report at one of the next meetings.

This is a serious matter for us Canadians. We ought not to remain the second largest financial sponsor of the association, after France, without any hope of ever seeing a Canadian heading this international association. I know that Senator Asselin will continue his efforts with the full support not only of his Canadian colleagues but also of many other sections.

Honourable senators, I could talk for over an hour about our work in Quebec City. However it is difficult to analyse and understand texts and quote documents which have been prepared for reading and consideration in a restful atmosphere.

For this reason I will refrain from reading the full text of the resolutions adopted at the conclusion of our work.

Still, if I may say so, the cultural commission, for example presented the following resolution which was among those endorsed by the plenary assembly:

That schools and universities where teaching is in French be even more readily accessible to francophone students of other countries.

Thus Canada is urged to open still wider the doors of our institutions, colleges and universities.

And I quote another resolution:

That all scientists of member countries publish their research work in French first that they may later on publish in another language, without impediment.

This recommendation makes sense to anyone who knows that a number of English language scientific magazines accept only unpublished material, which prevents francophone researchers from publishing their findings in French first. This requirement originates mostly from American publishers.

Again the co-operation and development commission reviewed the situation in Sahel and made a series of nine recommendations which are all aimed at finding solutions to an African problem that has been growing worse for nearly 15 years; the gradual desertic soil encroachment and its dire consequences for the people of the African continent.

This commission timidly recommended, in fact expressed the wish, and I quote:

That the association, through its policies, projects and recommendations to the various governments, contribute to promote the real integration of women in the decision-making process as a means of achieving development.

The purpose of this wish is to take into account the preferences and interests of women in the selection of the various development objectives and strategies. Needless to say, it applies to the Third World, but undoubtedly we could give it serious consideration right here in Canada.

Aware as I am of the kindness of honourable senators, I would seek leave to have the official and brief report of our delegation printed as an appendix to today's hansard.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: How many pages?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix p . . .)

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, to answer Senator Molgat's question, there are two and a half pages of text, double-spaced and in both official languages, need I add . . .

Senator Molgat: I certainly have no objection to having it printed. But I do think we should try and avoid giving our automatic consent when someone asks for a document to be printed as an appendix to Hansard and we don't know what it represents in terms of cost.

Senator Corbin: Perhaps I may comment on Senator Molgat's remarks and say that I deliberately restrained myself. I was asked to submit, in addition to the official report, the many pages of resolutions adopted at the end of our meetings in Quebec City. I thought that was overdoing it a little, because it would have meant several hours of overtime at least and quite a few pages of text. I think we get the gist of these meetings from the report by the Canadian section. In fact, in this very report, I invite honourable senators who are interested to ask the Parliamentary Relations Secretariat if they want the definitive texts of the general meeting in Quebec. They are available.

Senator Molgat: That is an excellent idea.

Senator Corbin: Before I conclude my speech, honourable senators, some of you may know that the Association internationale des parlementaires de langue française has an order with ranks inspired by those of the Legion of Honour. I am referring to La Pléiade, Ordre de francophonie et du dialogue des cultures.

This year again, a number of well-known Canadians were honoured by our association. I will read their names and the rank they received. Some recipients are well known while others may not be, and I will identify them as I go along.

In alphabetical order, awards were given to the following:

Mr. Edward Broadbent, officer. Mrs. Irène Chabot, chevalier; Mrs. Chabot, a resident of Saskatchewan, is now Vice-President of Franco-Saskatchewan publications, President of the advisory committee on French education with the Department of Education of that province, and President of Mathieu College.

Right Honourable Charles Joseph Clark, Commander.

Mr. Roger Duhamel, Chevalier. The award was given posthumously, to Mrs. Duhamel. As you may know, Mr. Duhamel was at one time the Queen's Printer, Ambassador to Portugal and President of the Alliance française of Ottawa and Montréal. He had a distinguished literary career as a writer and was a member of the Académie canadienne-française and of the Royal Society of Canada.

Mr. Gérard Duquet, with the rank of Chevalier. His award was presented posthumously to Mrs. Duquet. Mr. Duquet was the federal Member of Parliament for Quebec City from 1965 to 1982 and had served at the office of the Canadian section.

The Honourable Jacques Flynn, with the rank of Chevalier.

Mr. Antoine Gaborieau, Chevalier. Mr. Gaborieau is a retired professor from Manitoba. He is also a writer and the author of educational textbooks. Naturally, he has played an active role in Franco-Manitoban life throughout his career.

Reverend Roger Guindon, with the rank of Commander. He was rector of the University of Ottawa from 1964 to 1984 and is now retired.

The honourable Marcel Lambert, Commander, our well-known former colleague in the House of Commons.

Mrs. Jacqueline Martin, Chevalier. She is a resident of Ontario who has contributed greatly to the promotion of women in her own province and elsewhere.

The Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, Prime Minister, Great Cross.

Mr. Marcel Pelletier, Chevalier, jurist and parliamentary advisor to the House of Commons.

Mr. Yves Prévost, Chevalier. A retired Quebec lawyer who was also a member of the provincial legislature from 1948 to 1962. He was a tenured law professor at Laval University and a professor of school legislation at the educational Sciences faculty of Laval University.

Mrs. Jeannine Séguin, Chevalier. This is another Franco-Ontarian who has worked throughout the province and who has distinguished herself as president of the Association canadienne-française de l'Ontario, or ACFO.

And finally, Mr. Max Yalden, with the rank of Commander. Presently Ambassador to Belgium, he was Official Languages Commissioner for seven years.

There! The names of these distinguished Canadians who have been awarded the Ordre de la Pléiade will now be part of the record of the Senate of Canada. Can there be any nobler distinction? Thank you, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak on this inquiry, I declare the debate completed.

"A PEOPLE APART—NATIVES IN SASKATOON"

SPECIAL NEWSPAPER REPORT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, October 30, 1986:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to a special report by the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix entitled "A People Apart—Natives in Saskatoon".

He said: Honourable senators, I note that it is getting late in the afternoon, but I think it is important that I proceed with my Inquiry, with your cooperative indulgence.

A few weeks ago I sent to every senator and every member of the House of Commons a copy of an outstanding piece of investigative journalism published in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix entitled: "A People Apart—Natives in Saskatoon". It was a 24-page supplement, extremely well done, beautifully photographed, with no advertising, which is unusual, I say to my honourable friend, Senator Doyle, for a newspaper these days, and one which I thought was so meaningful and so important that I felt it necessary to draw it to the attention of the Senate and the members of the House of Commons. It is my hope that as a result of this there will be some discussion, and perhaps the overall supplement will have a significant impact on our attitude to natives, the problems that they face and the future of a group of Canadians which, by the way, includes the Inuit as well as native Indians.

Honourable senators, it is not my intention to use my own expression but to quote excerpts from a variety of articles which will give you the general impression created by these very able people led by a first-class reporter by the name of Mr. Earl Fowler, who is the native affairs reporter of the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, many other young writers and many photographers of fine photographs.

In this regard, may I draw to your attention—and you have copies in your offices—to one of the most moving photographs I have ever seen in a newspaper. It is of Nathaniel Benson stopping for a meal at the Friendship Inn, a charitable food-dispensing service operated in the city of Saskatoon. It is the kind of photograph that is probably more impressive than anything I could say about the situation of native people in my home city, Saskatoon, a fine, comfortable and clean city of about 175,000; a city that is reasonably prosperous, but one which has this hidden underbelly of very difficult life for those of Indian ancestry who live in that community.

Allow me, then, to quote to you some excerpts from the information that was published and which, I hope, will be of interest to you. On the front page of the newspaper article it states:

Strangers in Canada's cities. Refugees in their own land. A people apart.

Catch-phrases like these describe the tens of thousands of natives who, during the last 20 years, moved to the blighted cores of our cities, areas abandoned by all but the poor.

This special report documents the shocking poverty of Saskatoon's native community, and the problems experienced in employment, education, housing and health care.

But it also has some hopeful stories about native languages and culture, native-run schools and community-initiated housing programs, and child welfare and self-help groups.

This supplement—prepared by a team of Star-Phoenix reporters led by native affairs reporter Earl Fowler—is an ambitious but, no doubt, flawed attempt to bridge that gap with a little understanding.

How do Saskatonians—that is how we describe people who live in that fine city—feel about natives? The following is only a segment of a partial list of questions asked in the survey. The survey asked, "How many people believe natives are discriminated against?" The response was that 87.6 per cent answered in the affirmative and 12.4 per cent answered in the negative. Another question asked in the survey was, "Why do natives live in poverty?" The response in percentages was as follows:

Lazy, 8.7; Alcoholism, 9.2; Backward, 6.5; Not success oriented, 12.5; Not wise with money, 9.6; Poorly educated, 15.5; Lack of assimilation, 5.7; Unemployment, 8.1; Discrimination, 7.4; Lack of opportunities, 5.5; Other, 11.3

This gives the wide range of reasons given by people in our city as to why natives are living in poverty.

The next question was, "How much contact do people have with natives?" It was interesting to note that only 17.5 per cent of the respondents had a lot of contact, 54.5 per cent had little contact and 27.8 had no contact. These native people are living in an isolated world.

Another question was asked as to why natives said they moved to the city. The following is the response of natives based on a 1983 University of Winnipeg study. It states:

Better jobs, 24.2; Better housing, 4.5; Better education, 19.0; Join family, 16.0; Problems at home, 12.3; Medical, 4.6; Wanted a change, 9.3; Other, 10.0.

Saskatoon, a city of about 175,000, has approximately 11,000 native people. We do not know the exact number; that will be determined by the last census.

The newspaper report goes on to state:

Like most other cities in western Canada, Saskatoon has been profoundly changed in the last 20 years by the influx of thousands of native people from Indian reserves and Métis villages. Estimates of the city's native population vary from a little more than 11,000, projected in a 1983 report by two University of Winnipeg researchers as the likely 1986 population, to as high as 23,000, proffered by native consultant Kim Beaudin of the Saskatoon Parks and Recreation Department.

I might say that in Regina it is estimated that 20 per cent of that city's population is of native ancestry, and it may be higher.

Today, according to president Dan Bellegarde of the Saskatchewan Indian Institute of Technologies, "... fully 50 per cent of the Saskatchewan Indian population is here in the cities already."

Children and young adults accounted for between 70 and 75 per cent of Indian migrants to the two cities between 1978 and 1982. They are a youthful population.

The newspaper report also states:

Economic issues, especially the desire for better employment and training opportunities, were cited most frequently as the reasons for migration to the city of both status Indians and Métis and non-status Indians. Family ties in the city and problems on the reserve or home communities were identified frequently as the reasons for migration among native females.

Yet, as this supplement documents, the conditions under which a large proportion of the native people in this city are living raise frightening questions about the kind of place Saskatoon is. More to the point, the report, in this supplement, makes it obvious that the native population in Saskatoon, as in the rest of the province, is characterized by ill health, lack of education, high incarceration rates, poor housing and lack of employment.

Bill Peterson wrote an article entitled, "Media claimed giving Indians raw deal."

Jim Struthers, a former Saskatoon Star-Phoenix publisher—Senator Doyle may remember him—and now executive vice-president of the Regina Leader-Post, told a meeting of Saskatchewan journalists last year the media have failed in dealing with Indians.

Despite a burgeoning native population, Saskatchewan's media "... have scarcely recognized and certainly not faced in any material way ..." the native face, Struthers said. He went on to state:

If news can be defined as the new and unusual, then surely the successes many native individuals, families and enterprises have had in escaping the Indian stereotype need, deserve, and in fact have a right to a larger place in media content.

Earl Fowler writes about rent rip-offs and appalling conditions. An independent study released in July of 1985 found that 47 per cent of reserve housing in Canada is physically sub-standard to the degree that it requires immediate, serious rehabilitation. The average citizen of a typical town in Saskatchewan, La Loche, a village of 2,300, is native, on welfare and sharing a two- or three-bedroom house with eight others. Some houses there have more than 20 residents.

It was not a big surprise in 1979 when the Report of the Task Force on Housing for Native People in Saskatoon disclosed that one of the reasons natives were moving to the city was to find better housing. What did they find? Walk through any of the city's poorer neighbourhoods—the parts of Riversdale that are more than 20 per cent native, for example—and it is easy to find poorly insulated bedrooms, unreliable furnaces and fire-trap appliances, floors that sag, broken doors, missing doors, broken windows, pipes that clatter and taps that do not work.

Honourable senators, Earl Fowler writes further about programs just for natives. This is on a more positive note—I would not want to leave a completely negative impression. Some native families, like hundreds of others in Saskatoon, are beneficiaries of low income housing programs run by non-profit corporations set up to serve native people. These families are not terribly different in their needs from the hundreds of non-native people in Saskatoon who benefit from other public housing programs. But they are special in that, with a little help from their landlords, they put the lie to the stereotypical image of native people as undesirable tenants.

It is true, of course, that some natives are poor tenants, just as some whites are poor tenants. Carole Camponi, the manager of Saskatchewan Native Rentals Ltd., says that it is harder to be a good tenant when on welfare than when working because of the cluster of problems poverty engenders, including low self-esteem and family discord. But it was stressed that with a little help, native people, whether on welfare or not, are usually excellent tenants. That is a message they feel too few people in the city have heard.

The three native housing agencies collectively offer affordable accommodation to more than 365 native families. Despite this large inventory and the presence of more native families in housing authority units available to all low income people, the demand for inexpensive quality housing has scarcely abated.

Earl Fowler has also written "Tenant Advisers Working Miracles", in which he notes that each of the three native housing corporations in Saskatoon has family workers, tenant counsellors or property managers. They are hired to work alongside the maintenance workers, office staff and other people one would expect to find in a property management firm. That is where the supportive, educational philosophy of the agencies comes in. Corporation manager Carole Camponi, to whom I have already referred, said that this approach has worked miracles.

Again on a more positive note, I refer to "Education—Working to Reverse a Colossal Tragedy," also written by Earl Fowler. At their spring conference in 1970, the chiefs of Saskatchewan, who represent 67 Indian bands in the province, debated in detail the subject of education. They concluded that:

It was a matter of tragic proportion. Generation after generation of Indian youth was being destroyed, consigned to a life of uselessness, despair, frustration and indignity.

A 1982 survey of 422 native households in Regina and 309 such households in Saskatoon, conducted by researchers Stewart Clatworthy and Jeremy Hull of the University of Winnipeg's Institute of Urban Studies, indicated that while about a quarter of the native working-age population in both cities has graduated from high school, more than 40 per cent of the population had not received any formal high school education. They report that:

With the exception of older Saskatoon natives, the Métis and non-status Indian populations have achieved higher levels of education than the status Indian population... Both native groups, however, lag far behind the general urban populations with respect to formal education.

Why do native youth and adults want their own programs, especially with reference to education? Why is native control over education an issue at all? President Alex Greyeyes said that the Saskatchewan Indian Cultural College, for example, has an annual federally-funded budget of about $1 million. President Dan Bellegarde said that it cost various federal departments $3.5 million last year to finance the Saskatchewan Indian Institute of Technologies. But the short answer to those questions, according to Bellegarde, is that Indians and Métis have fared very poorly under educational programs conducted by non-native governments, administrators, and teachers.

Again on the grim side, honourable senators, I make reference to a story written by Earl Fowler, called "Natives Face Frightening Health Situation." Anyone who watches the news or reads the paper will be aware that Canadian native people living in remote communities and on reserves are sick a lot and often die young. "The life expectancy is 10 years less than the national average," noted two physicians in an article in the November 1, 1985, issue of the Canadian Medical Association Journal. They went on to say:

The infant mortality rate is 60 per cent higher, and the post-natal mortality rate is 100 per cent higher than the national figures.

Saskatchewan Indians have a suicide rate that is six times higher than the national average, according to a report prepared for the Saskatchewan Mental Health Association's task force on mental health in 1981. Studies have demonstrated that conditions like these are largely a consequence of the substandard housing, poor or non-existent water and sewer systems and the alcoholism, poverty and depression so obvious in some native communities.

Dr. Stephen Helliard, physician to hundreds of transient native people in Saskatoon, said:

The main problems we see are children with infectious diseases, alcohol-related illnesses, women with gynaecological complaints, and we get a fair number of obstetrical patients. Usually the diseases are more severe when we see them, because poor transient native people, like poor people everywhere, delay coming to a physician. They have access to medical care, but don't use it as readily as people would from a white middle class background.

Earl Fowler also wrote "Living as One of the Poorest of the Poor", wherein he points out that there are two main reasons why the health of transient native people in Saskatchewan is so poor. One is that they do not use city health facilities the way that they are set up to be used. The other is that native people are poor—unbelievably poor—in a city where the average per capita income in 1983 was $18,341, according to the latest Revenue Canada statistics.

Poverty is the greatest single cause of the high sickness rate among native people seen at the West Side Community Clinic, according to Dr. Stephen Helliard. Poverty in Saskatoon means that children are going to school hungry and performing poorly as a result; pregnant women are not eating and drinking enough milk to breast feed their babies; families are condemned to live in cold, draughty houses, and some patients cannot afford to have prescriptions filled. These are the kinds of problems that face our native population in a prosperous city like Saskatoon.

The effect of poverty on the health of native people in Saskatchewan is clear even before they leave the womb. In 1981 the infant mortality rate for children under one year of age per 1,000 live births was 22.3—almost double the provincial rate of 11.6. But it certainly does not end there. Saskatchewan Indians are 2.2 times more likely to suffer from acute respiratory infections than the average citizen; 3 times more likely to suffer from bronchitis, emphysema or asthma, and 5.7 times more likely to suffer from pneumonia, according to a 1977 breakdown of Medicare data. These are some of the health problems that face us.

Honourable senators, I have some even more alarming reports. I read in the headline of an article that 70 per cent of Indian men will be jailed by age 25. The statistics are as sad and, for the uninitiated, as shocking as anything one would read in the paper today about South Africa, Lebanon or the Soviet Union.

Senator Frith: Did you say 70 per cent?

Senator Buckwold: Seventy per cent of Indian men will be jailed by the age of 25. This is in Saskatchewan, where between 12 and 15 per cent of the population is thought to be native, and these are the remarkable findings of a study published in 1980, "Admissions to Saskatchewan Provincial Correctional Centres". The projections to 1993 present startling statistics. The incarceration rates for males over 15 years of age are: Status Indian, one in eight; Métis and non-status Indian, one in 25; and non-native, one in 200. Incarceration rates for females over 15 are: Status Indian, one in 50; Métis and non-status Indian, one in 200; and non-natives, one in 5,000.

A summary of the report presented in a 1983 review of the Regina police service canine unit noted:

Assuming absence of change to the criminal justice system, about 70 per cent of the status Indian men can expect to be imprisoned in a provincial correctional centre by the age of 25. For Métis and non-status, the figure is 34 per cent and for non-native men, the figure is 8 per cent. In the case of women, 14 per cent of all status women can expect to be jailed by the age of 25. Equivalent figures for Métis and non-status Indians, and non-natives, are 2.5 per cent and 0.3 per cent respectively.

They are really startling statistics. In the 12 months preceding March 31, 1986, native men and women accounted for 4,565 out of 7,121 sentence admissions to Saskatchewan's four provincial correctional institutes—64 per cent. That represents 10 per cent or 12 per cent of the population.

Eighty-nine per cent of the women sentenced to Prince Albert's Pine Grove Correctional Centre—the only jail in the province for women—were of Indian ancestry—89 per cent! A figure of 63.7 per cent of all male admissions to provincial jails were native while the comparable native percentage of female offenders was 85.1 per cent.

The more recent report from the Solicitor General indicated, with regard to Criminal Code fine default admissions in 1982-83—where people cannot pay their fine—that Saskatchewan had “by far the highest” ratio of native to non-native admission rates of any province. Natives were 62 times more likely to go to jail for failure to pay fines than non-natives in 1982-83.

The next article has the heading “Upon Release From Jail: ‘We’ll All Be Back’.” “Because they’re poor”, said Irene Hanna, when asked why so many native people end up in conflict with the law. “There are certain backgrounds that involve poverty and alcoholism and broken families,” said Saskatoon legal aid lawyer Kearney Healy, “which seem to lead to a position where people are left with only one alternative. And that seems to be doing the criminal things that their friends are doing.” Members of the sub-culture, both white and native, accept the prospect of jail time as an unavoidable, undesirable part of their lifestyle, said Healy, adding that many first get into trouble as juveniles.

Ron Camponi, manager of a company which provides low-rental housing for Indians and Metis on social assistance in Saskatoon, put it this way:

If a 14-year old girl came into my office right now and said: “Look, I just got kicked out of my house and kicked out of school. What can you do for me?”, I’d say I’m sorry. You haven’t got in deep enough yet. Go and get yourself pregnant, get an alcohol problem, and we’ll have scads of people to look after you. Our whole social services system—who does it cater to? The adults, that’s who. Nobody is doing anything about the children.

I am sure honourable senators will be pleased to know that I am nearing the end. Earl Fowler again writes that the issue is simple but the solution is complex. The question is a simple one. What can be done to make the continuing transition of thousands of native people to life in Saskatoon, or any city, as painless and successful as possible? The answer is not so simple, nor is there a single solution. Most native leaders tout self-government as the way out of the wilderness. Indian self-government made the transition from “a vague notion to a detailed blueprint” in 1983, when a special parliamentary committee on the topic released a 200-page report endorsing the concept, as chief human rights officer, Bill Rafoss, observed in a Saskatchewan human rights newsletter published a year later. The seven-member committee, chaired by Ontario Liberal MP Keith Penner, recommended that Indian self-government be entrenched in the Constitution, “forming a distinct order of government,” with a carefully defined jurisdiction.

The committee report said that Indian people should have full control over their territory and resources within the boundaries of Indian lands, with authority to legislate in such areas as social and cultural development, education and family relations, land and resource use, revenue raising, economic and commercial development, and justice and law enforcement.

The Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations, for example, hopes to set up its own justice system, with Indian-controlled courts based on a traditional way of dealing with offenders; an Indian legal aid plan, Indian probation officers, and an Indian correctional service that would use alternatives to incarceration as a means of reducing the disproportionate number of Indian people in our jails.

But even assuming—and this is a big assumption—that Ottawa and Regina are willing to share significant financial resources and legislative powers with emergent native governments, it is still difficult to predict what self-government would mean to Saskatoon’s native population—and it is not universally accepted that that is the only way that we are going to solve the problem.

Don Purich, Director of the Native Law Centre at the University of Saskatchewan, said that he could envisage three areas where self-government might mean something for urban Indian people: First, if Indian governments became viable in the sense of having an economic base, there would be less incentive for people to leave, and some now in urban centres might want to go back.

Second, Indian governments might have some jurisdiction over Indian people off reserves. For example, in child welfare matters and things of that nature, agencies set up by bands might cater to their members in the city.

Third, self-government in native communities might provide the model for native governing institutions in Saskatoon, such as a separate school board for Indian-run educational institutions.

In conclusion, Verne Clemence wrote, “Maybe it’s time to try something new.” When European and Indian societies first came together on this continent eons ago, a process was set in motion which ultimately produced the deplorable living conditions of urban Indians. They simply became the victims of a radically different economic system which systematically reduced them to a state of poverty.

Generations later, Canadians can reflect on those roots of “the Indian Problem” and recall changes in rhetoric about Indians over the years. But, sadly, the score card, as illustrated by so many statistical accounts of modern-day Indian life, will tell them that precious little has really changed. Indians still exist largely outside of the economic mainstream. Their inferior status is still implied in the missionary zeal practised by some religious groups and in dozens of other facets of urban life.

In hundreds of communities across the country, as is the case in Saskatoon, to say “Indian” summons up images of Lysol drinkers, prostitutes, minors shoplifting in the malls, undernourished children and housing of the most degrading sort. Every major urban centre has its 20th Street—all of which is to say that the clash of the two cultures, begun so long ago, has not yet been resolved.

Are any lessons being learned? Is there any sign yet of an awakening awareness that all of the money, all of the “solutions” devised by generations of white societies, and all of the Indian Affairs Departments of governments across the land have brought social or economic justice for Canada’s natives?

For example, does not the totality of those stories and other evidence strongly suggest that, in the main, any improvements for Indians are coming about through their own efforts and the application of Indian knowledge and wisdom. Is it not time to face up to the realities of white-Indian relations, to admit to the ugly parts and the years of failure, and to learn from the small successes now evident? White society, however well intentioned, has made precious little progress in overcoming the obstacles that it has itself created, such as racism. Perhaps it is time to try a better way.

Honourable senators, as I indicated at the beginning of this address, what you have heard is basically a summary in quotation from the Star-Phoenix supplement on “A People Apart—Natives in Saskatoon.”

I would like to conclude with a few comments on the general issue of native people in Canada, with special reference to western Canada. I am sure honourable senators will agree with me that many of the statistics I have presented are very disturbing and must be of concern to all who are striving for the equality of all Canadians. It might even be said that some of the figures seem to be almost too alarming. Even if that is the case, the hard fact is that to be an Indian, or of Indian descent, for most people means a very difficult, frustrating and discouraging future.

Many Canadians are of the opinion that native problems are often created by natives themselves; that if they could only accept the reality of the Canadian scene, they would adapt to the majority culture and, in due course, be able to resolve the difficulties that face them.

It is easy to characterize native people as lazy and lacking in ambition, but nothing could be further from the truth. To be raised in the environment which faces them makes it very difficult, indeed, to adapt to the culture of the majority. Faced with the realities of Indian life, one can understand the frustration, despair and hopelessness that leads to a lifestyle which is self-defeating.

I am the first to agree that many native people are not doing enough for themselves, but I also feel emphatically that given the right opportunities the native people of Canada can proudly take their place in Canadian society.

The problem is particularly difficult in western Canada. In cities such as Thunder Bay, Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Regina, Edmonton, Calgary or Vancouver native people are living a very sordid existence. This also extends to the smaller cities and towns of the western provinces. In the ghettos, back alleys and dismal streets of those locations we see tragedy and suffering. On the other hand, there are many instances of progress being made. There are successes, and some individuals and families are breaking out of the mould and achieving a better life.

In my opinion, it will be necessary for Indian society to develop a middle class and then move on to achieve its goals.

Education becomes the key. I have said to many of my native friends that until a full appreciation of the value of education is accepted by a great majority of Indian people, progress will be very slow, indeed. All the government help and funding will only achieve minor breakthroughs without the willingness of parents to educate their children, even at some sacrifice to themselves. I believe this is happening now, but it is a process that should be greatly accelerated.

I take this opportunity to express appreciation to government ministers of Indian Affairs. I believe all of them have tried sincerely to improve the situation. The present minister, the Honourable Bill McKnight of Saskatchewan, is no exception. He is doing the very best he can, but he realizes that the process is a slow and difficult one. I again congratulate the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, its editors and staff in so dramatically bringing to our attention the Indian scene in Saskatoon which, in reality, is a reflection of native life in all of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, before I begin my remarks, might I inquire as to how much time I have before Royal Assent?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: You have about five minutes.

Senator Marchand: I shall start, anyway, and adjourn the debate to tomorrow. First, I would like to congratulate Senator Atkins on his maiden speech. I was not present when he was sworn in. It was a very impressive and complete address for a first attempt in this chamber. It was obvious that it was not his first speech. I also want to congratulate Senator Buckwold on the way in which he made his presentation. I join with him in congratulating the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix on the very comprehensive special report it produced.

Senator Buckwold’s remarks were so complete that he has covered many of the things that I wanted to say. In going over this report, a few things jumped out at me. One of them was raised by Senator Buckwold. In the survey that was conducted, there was a question on how Saskatonians feel about natives. The first question was, “How many people believe native people are discriminated against?” I was alarmed to read in the response that 87.6 per cent of the people feel that natives are discriminated against.

I like many of the conclusions drawn in the article. There are such questions as, “What can we do? What are the answers?” There are no easy or short-term answers. Many of the answers involve the long term. The basis for those answers lies with the ability of native people to solve our own problems in our own way. That is wherein the solution lies. However, much can be done along the way. The media in whatever form—radio, television, newspapers—has, by and large, put forth a hit-or-miss effort. I would bet that this special report created a lot of excitement in Saskatoon. So often, that excitement is very short lived. A lot of noise is made and there will be some rubbing of hands, but not much will get done. I would like to see a more concerted effort. I think that people like Barbara Frum and Pamela Wallins could do a lot more.

An Hon. Senator: How about Jack Webster?

Senator Marchand: I think that he has done pretty well. He has brought forward some of the more important aspects of the question of aboriginal land claims and other aboriginal claims relating to fishing, hunting and so on. However, the approach of the media in general has been very incomplete and hit and miss. A better job can be done.

One of the headings in the report is "Media Claimed Giving Indians raw Deal." Perhaps, in some ways, that is true, but not totally true. For example, this report by the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix is a pretty good effort. You cannot say that they are giving us a raw deal here.

One part of the report in particular caught my eye. It reads:

Many current native views are similar to what Quebecers felt in the late 1950's when serious talks of separation began. It took until 1962 and bombs in the streets to focus the attention of English Canada on Quebec. Then there was a media rush to tell the Quebec story... dig out the experts... and explain a complex situation. We never seem to learn. Why aren't we telling the native story now?

That portion of the report jumped out at me, because there is a lot to it and because a lot can be done. I shall be bringing forward to this chamber at a later date a proposal, perhaps in the way of an inquiry, or whatever mechanism it takes to get the job done. I want to bring to the attention of honourable senators the report of the Special Committee on Youth entitled "Plan of Action", under the chairmanship of our very able Senator Hébert. Because of the seriousness of the native youth problem, we as members of the committee included a special section in the report. One of the recommendations is that a Standing Senate Committee on Native Issues be established with ex officio members from the First Nations. It went on to say:

As a first item of business, this committee should clarify the situation of young native people and define the opportunities which now exist and can be created for young Canadians in both the First Nations and non-native communities to further a peaceful process of change.

Let us talk about some of the things that can be done. The Senate of Canada has a pretty good history over a long period of time in digging into a lot of the serious problems that face our native people. In 1926-27 a Special Joint Committee on Claims of Allied Indian Tribes of British Columbia was formulated to inquire into those claims, as set forth in petitions to Parliament in June 1926. There were earlier efforts, but this particular inquiry was pretty special because it did a lot of good work and made a lot of good recommendations. In 1947-48 a Special Joint Committee on the Indian Act was formed. Much of the work of that committee led to amendments to the Indian Act.

There is a little irony here because, in Senator Buckwold's remarks, one of the solutions that was put forward by a number of people was self-government. I happen to agree with the Penner report in many of its aspects. It was an excellent report and it contains a whole lot of things that can be done in the future. One of the recommendations that that 1949 report contained was that such reserves as become sufficiently advanced should be recommended for incorporation.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Marchand, I am sorry to interrupt you, but the deputy of Her Excellency the Governor General has arrived.

Senator Marchand: Very well, honourable senators. I move that the debate be adjourned until tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Marchand, debate adjourned.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay, pursuant to his notice of motion dated November 4, 1986, moved:

THAT the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to continue the study undertaken in 1985-86 on the Consultation Paper on Child and Elderly Benefits, issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare, tabled in the Senate on the 5th February, 1985, and to report thereon;

THAT the papers and evidence taken on the subject and the work accomplished during the First Session of the Thirty-Third Parliament be referred to the Committee; and

THAT the Committee present its report no later than Tuesday, 22nd December 1987.

He said: Honourable senators, I would not like to delay further the proceedings of this afternoon, but it seems to me that the motion I have moved is a housekeeping one. For all practical purposes, it means solely to authorize the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology to continue the study undertaken during the previous session, so that—

FIFTEENTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY

FOURTH REPORT OF CANADIAN SECTION

The Canadian delegation which participated in the XVth General Assembly of the AIPLF in Quebec City from September 6 to 13, 1986 has the honour to present the

FOURTH REPORT

OF THE CANADIAN SECTION OF THE AIPLF

THE XVth General Assembly of the AIPLF was held in Quebec City from September 6 to 13, 1986. It was preceded by a meeting in Toronto to officially inaugurate the Ontario Section of the AIPLF. After the General Assembly, the Federal Section organized a visit to Vancouver. A total of thirty legislatures were represented at this General Assembly.

The Canadian delegation which attended the meetings was composed of the following persons:

- The Hon. Martial Asselin, P.C., Senator
Chairman of the Canadian Section
Vice-President of the AIPLF
Deputy Speaker of the Senate
Head of the delegation
- The Hon. Yvette Rousseau, Senator
- The Hon. Eymard Corbin, Senator
- Mr. Ian Waddell, M.P.
- Mr. Don Boudria, M.P.
- Mr. André Harvey, M.P.
- Mrs. Carole Jacques, M.P.
- Mr. Nic Leblanc, M.P.
- Mr. Louis PLamondon, M.P.
- Mrs. Henriette Immarigeon
Executive Secretary
- Mr. Martin Lavoie
Acting Deputy Executive Secretary

Activities were carried out by the Executive, by the General Assembly meeting in a plenary session and by the various committees.

The Executive focused its attention on issues of major concern to the AIPLF. One of these was underlined by the Canadian Section, which proposed that the highest positions within the Association's Executive be filled on a rotating basis. Indeed, it was noted that for a number of years, the position of Chairman had been filled by members from various continents, but never by a North American. The Canadian Section moved, seconded by the Quebec Section, that at some point in the future this position be filled by a North American representative. The motion prompted a lengthy debate and a decision was made to set up a committee to examine the proposal. A report will be presented at the next meeting of the Executive scheduled to be held in Belgium in early 1987.

The Committee on General Affairs, which examines all matters relating to the Association's structure and financing, reviewed a number of issues, in particular, the status of the staff and the AIPLF's financing methods. It also reviewed the Association Statutes which had been out of date for a number of years. Furthermore, it examined the potential impact of the Sommet de la francophonie on the AIPLF and asked the study group that would be looking into the rotation principle to also examine future ties between the Francophone Summit and the AIPLF.

The various AIPLF committees examined the following subjects:

The Committee on Cultural Affairs:

- The teaching of French as a first language, as a second language and as an international language

The Committee on Development and Cooperation:

- Development management

The Committee on Parliamentary Affairs:

- Election procedures: investiture of candidates and voting methods

As usual, the Ad Hoc AIPLF — AGELOOP Committee examined relations between these two organizations. The committees also examined past activity reports and made proposals concerning upcoming programs.

A copy of the resolutions drafted by the various committees can be obtained from the Parliamentary Relations Branch. They are too long and technical for reproduction here. These resolutions were proposed by the various Committees. All of the resolutions were passed during the plenary session which closed the General Assembly.

Also during the last meeting of the General Assembly, the delegates elected a Parliamentary Secretary General. A member of the French Section has always held this position, and again a French candidate was elected, in this instance, Mr. Jacques Legendre, who immediately took up his duties.

Elections to the Executive were also held. Dr. Daouda Sow from Senegal was re-elected to the Presidency. The Vice-Presidents were also re-elected.

- Communauté française de Belgique: Mr. André Baudson
- Cameroon: Mr. Théodore Mayi Matip

- Canada: Hon. Martial Asselin
- Lebanon: Mr. Khatchig Babikian

Two changes occurred in the Executive membership. The New Brunswick Section replaced the Haitian Section which is currently inactive because of the country's political situation. The Djibouti Section also replaced the Egyptian Section which has not been active during the past few years.

As always, the work of this XVth General Assembly was animated and interesting. The numerous recommendations adopted and the variety of their contents witness the vitality of this Association.

Respectfully submitted,

EYMARD G. CORBIN,
Senator

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Hon. Stanley Haidasz presented Bill S-4, to amend the Hazardous Products Act (tobacco and tobacco products).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Haidasz, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday, November 27, 1986.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

"LEST WE FORGET"

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to our veterans as we approach Remembrance Day next week.

A famous general back in 1917 once disbanded his troops with the following challenge:

Let it be your pride to show all citizens everywhere

Not only what good soldiers you are—but also what good men you are

And, let us set for ourselves a standard so high—that it will be a glory to live up to it

And let us make sure we do live up to it and add a new laurel to the crown of our nation.

As we reflect today on that prophetic vision, Canadian veterans some seven decades later have proven "what good men they are," have set exemplary standards, and have added countless "new laurels to the crown of our nation."

Honourable senators, in a few days, on November 11, veterans will pay tribute to their fallen comrades in two world wars and the Korean conflict at ceremonies across Canada, and thousands of children amongst many thousands of citizens will watch and wonder what these ceremonies are all about. These children know little of battles and wars; they have no knowledge of the drone of bombers overhead, ships and crews lost in icy seas or the concussion of heavy guns.

But those children are the real reason for remembering, not a maudlin memory of things best forgotten, not a memory of hatred and cynicism, but a memory filled with understanding of the past and hope for the future, for which our veterans fought and laid down their lives. Without an understanding of where we have come from, it is impossible to know the direction in which we are heading. It is the youth, our children and grandchildren, who must set new courses of human action, compassion and understanding.

To paraphrase the oft repeated words of Colonel John McCrae,

To you, from failing hands we throw

The torch; be yours to hold it high.

So, honourable senators, across this great Dominion of Canada, while men and women pay tribute to those who served, we cannot, and must not, forget the past on this Remembrance Day 1986 if we wish a decent future for our children.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Marshall has said it so well that I simply want to record that we associate ourselves fully with the eloquent and very appropriate statement he has just made about that important day.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Hon. Ian Sinclair, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Thursday, November 6, 1986

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

THIRD REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill S-2, intituled: "An Act to implement conventions between Canada and the Kingdom of the Netherlands and Canada and Japan and agreements between Canada and the People's Republic of China and Canada and the Republic of Malta for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, 29th October, 1986, examined the said Bill and has agreed to report the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 49, Schedule III: Complete the text of paragraph 1 of Article 27 of the Convention by inserting in the second line thereof the word "Ottawa"

2. Page 95, Schedule VII: Complete the text of paragraph 1 of Article 29 of the Agreement by inserting in the second line thereof the word "Valletta"

Respectfully submitted,

IAN SINCLAIR
Chairman

He said: Honourable senators, if I may, and pursuant to the rules of this chamber, I would like to explain the two amendments. First of all, in regard to the amendment of the convention which is an appendix to the bill, there was an inadvertent slip and the word "Ottawa" was not placed in the text. There were just a few dots, so it was appropriate to put in the name of the place where the convention, once signed, would be exchanged.

Similarly, in regard to the convention with respect to the Republic of Malta. Again, all there was was a couple of dots and the drafter of the convention had inadvertently left out the name of the place where the documents were to be exchanged.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), bill read third time and passed.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-14
TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Ian Sinclair, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, tabled the committee's fourth report respecting the subject matter of Bill C-14, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

● (1410)

He said: Honourable senators, with leave, I should like to explain the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, as a result of the evidence submitted to the committee, I think it would be of interest to honourable senators to know that the officials from the department did acknowledge that the increase in sales taxes of 3 per cent, when taken in conjunction with the normal mark up or gross up on goods when they are moved from the retailer to the consumer, has a stiffer impact and makes that increase not 3 per cent but 6 per cent.

Secondly, the officials from the department have acknowledged, in dealing with excise tax increases on tobacco and alcoholic beverages, that the industry made strong representations that industry and government revenues had suffered the diminishing-return syndrome. The officials pointed out that there might be other reasons in the fall off in consumption, such as health considerations and a change of lifestyle, but they did acknowledge that diminishing returns might very well have resulted from the fact that the cost of these products has increased.

Honourable senators, I ask that the report be accepted by the Senate and that it be printed as an appendix to Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Honourable senators, since I am asking leave to move that the first, second and third reports of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration be now adopted, perhaps a word of explanation is in order. These reports outline the budgets for the respective committees for the balance of the 1986-87 fiscal year. Because of prorogation, they were required to be re-submitted, dealt with and reported. In each case the budgets were re-submitted and studied by the Subcommittee on Budgets and approved by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration at its meeting today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

THE ESTIMATES

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) DEEMED TO HAVE BEEN REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before putting the adjournment motion, I would like to say a word or two about it.

The adjournment which I propose to move will cover the activities of the Senate for the next two weeks. In accordance with the pattern that we have attempted to establish from the beginning of this session, I will propose that when we adjourn today, we stand adjourned until November 25. That is not to say that the Senate will not be busily engaged during that two week period. The subject matter of a number of bills has been referred to various committees for pre-study, while in other cases the bills themselves have been so referred after second reading in the normal course of Senate business. With the permission of the Senate, I will outline the agenda for the committees over the coming several weeks.

The Agriculture Committee has had referred to it the subject matter of Bill C-2, the Canagrex Dissolution Bill, and Bill C-12, which will amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. I realize that that committee has yet to hold an organizational meeting, but perhaps it can arrange to do that over the next week or so. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has before it the subject matter of Bill C-15, to amend the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act. I understand that it also has had referred to it Bill S-3, which was introduced by Senator Cogger and which received second reading yesterday. The Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee has before it Bill C-16, which will amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. The Transport Committee is studying Bill C-3, to amend the Radio Act, and Bill C-4, to amend the Railway Act.

I have just been given notice that the supplementary estimates (A) will be deemed to have been referred to the Finance Committee if they arrive during the time this chamber has adjourned. This will enable the Finance Committee to get a head start on the examination of these estimates in the event that the Senate is not sitting at that time. The Energy Committee has before it the subject matter of Bill C-6, respecting the Newfoundland Accord. Of course, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has before it Bill C-10, respecting the Excise Tax Act, Bill C-13, dealing with the corporate reorganization of Bell Canada, and Bill C-17, which contains the amendments to the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act, the subject matter of which was referred to that committee yesterday.

In addition to that, the Internal Economy Committee is now considering the main estimates for the Senate itself for the coming year. To that end, arrangements are being made to have the Subcommittee on Budgets meet to examine and prepare the draft estimates for submission to the chamber and thence to Treasury Board.

Honourable senators will see that there is a full schedule of work before us and that, although the Senate will not be sitting as a body during that period of time, certainly most, if not all, of us will be engaged in committee work during the next two weeks.

Everything I have said to date, of course, is subject to rule 14A, which provides that the Senate can be recalled during an adjournment in the event of an emergency. There might possibly be a situation that requires our attention—

Senator Olson: There is an emergency every day.

Senator Doody: At least one; some of us have more tribulations and trials than others. I understand that the honourable gentleman is speaking for himself in this particular instance. In any event, I commend this schedule to honourable senators for their approval.

With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, November 25, 1986, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have just one or two comments to make. I think it is entirely appropriate that the committees sit to do their work, even though the chamber itself is in adjournment. If that practice can be firmly understood, and particularly understood by the public, it would be a step forward. I notice that the Deputy Leader of the Government has laid out a schedule of legislative pre-studies of the subject matter of bills, as well as the study of bills actually referred. I wonder whether he has any comment to make on references which have been made to the standing committees, other than those regarding bills and the pre-study of bills. The Foreign Affairs Committee, for example, has been given an important reference to continue its study of international debt questions. I wonder whether provision is being made for that committee to meet while the Senate is adjourned.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, perhaps I may be permitted to answer that question. Senator MacEachen was present at the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs on Tuesday, but, unfortunately, he had to leave before we reached this particular matter. At that time it was agreed—and I will take this opportunity to give notice to those members of the committee who were not present at that time—that if the Senate were to adjourn today for two weeks rather than for one week, then we would take the opportunity to sit all day on Tuesday, November 18, since Tuesday is our regular sitting day, rather than at 11 a.m. for two hours only, which is our usual allotted time. Because the committee will be drafting its report and the meeting will be in camera, as a result of this motion, we intend to sit that day from 10 a.m. until the lunch break and then in the afternoon until the committee adjourns at 4 p.m. or 5 p.m. So, basically speaking, we shall be sitting all of that day for the purpose of drafting our report rather than at our usual sitting hour.

[Senator Doody.]

Senator Doody: I thank Senator van Roggen for his intervention and Senator MacEachen for asking the question. Similarly, other committees may be sitting to examine or prepare other items, such as the Committee on National Finance in connection with the drafting of its report on post-secondary education. I would suggest that it might be appropriate for the various committee chairmen to make arrangements with the whips for room space, staff, and so on, in anticipation of sitting during the forthcoming two weeks. That may make it easier to spread the workload and have the staff more readily available.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, on that point I believe it is important that we should attempt to co-ordinate the meetings, because a number of senators may wish to attend the meeting of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee as well as the meetings of other committees, including the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I suppose it is worth while noting—simply because I believe it was not always so—that all Senate committees have authority to sit while the Senate is adjourned.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA-U.S.S.R. RELATIONS

SPEECH OF CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO UNITED NATIONS—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF GOVERNMENT POLICY ON SOVIET OCCUPATION OF AFGHANISTAN

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to raise a question based on statements made by the Canadian Ambassador to the United Nations, which have been reported in the press, because his comments do raise some questions about the attitude of the government, or the perspective of the government, in connection with east-west relations and Canada-Soviet relations. Perhaps I can do no better than quote from the newspaper report of the ambassador's comments to the United Nations, which states that on Wednesday the Canadian Ambassador to the United Nations—

...accused the Soviet Union of exhibiting a "sickness equivalent to depravity" in its war against Moslem rebels in Afghanistan.

The report goes on to say that Lewis said the Soviet Union continues to believe that "nihilism is preferable to negotiation, that butchery is preferable to bargaining."

Because this rhetoric is at least as violent as, if not more violent than, the rhetoric of President Reagan in the early years of his administration—which was epitomized by the use of the expression "the evil empire," which was objected to quite widely in the western world and in Canada—can the Leader of the Government tell us whether Canada's Ambassador to the United Nations had the authority of the Government of Canada when he used such expressions as "sickness equivalent to depravity", and when he said that the Soviet Union believes "that butchery is preferable to bargaining"?

I also ask, in the opinion of the government that does not express the view of the government, that it be made clear and that the ambassador be instructed to read the expressions of policy which have been made by the foreign minister, whom I still believe to be a more important spokesman for Canada than any ambassador.

So, really, my question is: Is the Leader of the Government in a position to tell us whether Mr. Lewis spoke with the authority of the Government of Canada when he used language which is so reminiscent of the objectionable Reagan rhetoric epitomized by the expression "evil empire"? Now it is "butchery", which perhaps is worse.

Apart from that—

● (1430)

Senator Frith: Wine or vinegar?

Senator Sinclair: Bad wine!

Senator Murray:—I can only say that I had hoped to get a briefing on the matter today, but my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, is in Vienna attending the Conference on Security Co-operation in Europe, and I have been unable to get the kind of information that the Leader of the Opposition seeks. I simply make the point that whatever the language used, the context is the Soviet invasion and continuing occupation of Afghanistan, and it is pretty hard to find language strong enough to condemn that action.

Senator MacEachen: All of us have condemned the occupation of Afghanistan, and we continue to do so. However, the language used by the ambassador is extreme, violent and provocative. If it is just "vintage Lewis," then let us know that and let someone in authority tell Mr. Lewis that it does not represent government policy. In connection with the comments made by the Leader of the Government with respect to the occupation of Afghanistan, and notwithstanding that fact, I draw to his attention the statement made in the House of Commons by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on October 21. The Right Honourable Joe Clark said, as follows:

—we understand that on human rights questions and on a range of bilateral matters, progress continues to be made. Mr. Speaker, I should add that I was encouraged by my own talks on Human Rights with Soviet Foreign Minister Shevardnadze, when he visited Ottawa.

Then he goes on to say:

Canada believes progress here and on regional issues is essential to enable us to establish trust in each others intentions. This process of building trust is far from finished.

I wonder if anyone could believe that the utterances of the Ambassador to the United Nations, whether vintage or not, are consistent with that policy statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I ask the Leader of the Government whether he could give me some clarification on that point.

Senator Murray: The Leader of the Opposition has described the ambassador's statement as "extreme, violent and provocative." That is pretty tough language itself, I would think.

Senator Olson: Accurate.

Senator Murray: In any event, I have just received a copy of the ambassador's speech to the General Assembly of the United Nations. I have not had a chance to read it, because I just received it within the past minute. There is one point that I would like to draw to the attention of the Senate, and that is the fact that the ambassador is apparently not making this statement for the first time. Indeed, when he used the phrases to which the Leader of the Opposition referred, he was quoting something that he said last year. The paragraph read:

During the course of our intervention last year, I said on behalf of Canada that if we were back again, same time, this year, it is because the Soviet Union continues to believe that nihilism is preferable to negotiation; that butchery is preferable to bargaining.

Harsh words, I concede. But we're back again.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, it does not add to my comfort to be told that the ambassador used precisely the same words one year ago. It may add to the decibel level of the rhetoric, but it certainly does not add to any effort at moderation. I draw to the attention of the Leader of the Government that when Mr. Shevardnadze was here in October, the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced that Canada would begin final talks with the Soviets later that month on the renewal of the agreement on human contacts and exchanges that Ottawa suspended in 1979 to protest against the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. The minister said in Ottawa that they were negotiating to re-establish the pre-Afghanistan human contacts and exchanges in order, presumably, to build a trust, yet, our Ambassador to the United Nations is describing the Soviets as "preferring butchery to bargaining." I believe that this matter is very serious.

I want to know whether what the ambassador said represents Canada's view of East-West relations and Canada's view of Soviet-Canadian relations. The visit by Mr. Shevardnadze took place only a few weeks ago. The memories of the smiling Prime Minister and the smiling Soviet Foreign Minister when they were photographed in Ottawa are still fresh in our minds. There were no words of "nihilism" or "butchery" on that occasion. Is Mr. Lewis setting policy? Tell us.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, when the Leader of the Opposition refers to the decisions that were announced last month by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, he seems to be questioning the very principle of whether we should continue to condemn the invasion and occupation of Afghanistan. That we do, and that the ambassador has done in his speech to the United Nations. All the diplomatic niceties were abided by during the visit of the Soviet Foreign Minister, and we continue to seek good and better relations with the Soviet Union. However, that does not stop us from condemning the invasion and continued occupation of Afghanistan by Soviet troops. Nor did it stop the Secretary of State for External Affairs the other day in Vienna from taking a very tough stand about Soviet abuses of human rights. I would have hoped that the Leader of the Opposition would applaud him and the government on that as well.

Senator MacEachen: I certainly do applaud the government for opposing the invasion of Afghanistan and violations of human rights. But Mr. Lewis's condemnation is much wider. It is a blanket condemnation in which he attributes to the Soviet Union qualities that were equalled by those described in President Reagan's excessive vocabulary. He makes the blanket assertion that the Soviet Union as a government prefers "nihilism to negotiation" and "butchery to bargaining." That is much wider than a specific attack on the invasion by the Soviet Union. That is what I find objectionable, and I would hope that the Leader of the Government would agree with me that it is a much wider condemnation than anything that the minister has said. I hope that the government will clarify the matter and tell Mr. Lewis that "vintage Lewis," as the language is described by the Leader of the Government, is not always appropriate in the United Nations.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am sorry that this whole episode has given the Leader of the Opposition, as he says, some discomfort and that he finds it objectionable, but I do not think I can usefully add anything to what I have already said or that we can pursue it further today. However, I shall seek a prepared and considered reply on the matter from the Department of External Affairs and bring it in as soon as possible.

Senator MacEachen: I appreciate the thoughtful and careful reply, and I hope it is not evasive—

Senator Murray: Evasive? Me? Never!

Senator MacEachen: —because we will be following it up.

Senator Doody: A fellow Cape Bretonner?

Senator MacEachen: That is unfair.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION

APPOINTMENT OF ANTONIO ARCANGEL TO HUMAN RIGHTS TRIBUNAL

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government relating to the appointment of one Antonio Arcangel to the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal. Mr. Arcangel is the past president of the Toronto Chapter of Anak-ti-Batac, a well-known pro-Marcos organization. By the way, Batac is the name of the town in which former President Marcos was born and raised. A very large segment of the Philippine community in Canada has expressed surprise, indeed, amazement, unhappiness and outrage at this particular appointment. I wonder if the Leader of the Government could tell us whether or not the government was aware of Mr. Arcangel's close association with the Marcos regime before that appointment was made.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my information is that we were not.

Senator Graham: May I ask the Leader of the Government whether or not the appointment is under review?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my information is that the person in question has resigned.

Senator Frith: You could have waited until the question was asked.

Senator MacEachen: Supplementary, Alasdair?

INDUSTRY

AEROSPACE—ALLOCATION OF CF-18 SERVICE CONTRACT

Hon. Léopold Langlois: I wish to direct a question to the Government Leader in the Senate. It concerns an article which appeared on November 5, 1986, in the Journal de Montréal and was reprinted in the Quorum on the same date, under the headline: "CF-18: Laberge feels that Pawley does not have all the necessary information".

Mr. Laberge, President of the Quebec Labour Federation, was reported as saying, and I quote from the article.

It is not Canadair which has not met the conditions provided for the tenders, but the Bristol Aerospace consortium which has made uncalled for changes to its offer of services.

And I am now quoting Mr. Laberge own remarks:

"The first bid submitted by this consortium which was known as CAST was $150 million higher than that of Canadair. This consortium changed its name to Bristol, and through privileged information, submitted a new tender for service which was $4 million lower than that of Canadair. An investigation will have to be carried out to discover how Bristol had access to this information and submit a new tender after the deadline—"

I wish to emphasize the last part of this sentence:

—"and submit a new tender after the deadline".

My question to the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Could he confirm or deny this statement from Mr. Laberge, in order to put an end to this false pretence of a contract being unfairly awarded to Quebec which is being used to start another holy war against my province?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I think that in the first round, all tenders submitted were found unacceptable by the Government; a second round of tenders was necessary. I have no comment today concerning the article which appeared in the Journal de Montréal. I take as notice the question put by Hon. Senator Langlois and I will report back to him.

Senator Langlois: I did not expect that the government leader in the Senate could reply to my question today, but I hope you will be able to do so when we resume our sittings.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, my question is addressed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Today's Ottawa Citizen carries an article headed "NRC Axes Renowned 'Canadarm' Scientist." It then goes on to relate that Dr. Vlad Kratky, who is the head of the photogrammetric section of the NRC, and his whole team have been given notice that they will be disbanded and that there will be no money to continue their research after the end of March 1987. It is alleged in this article that this money is to be diverted toward the $1.2 billion U.S. orbiting platform project and space programs.

Nevertheless, it was the same group, under Dr. Kratky, who did the work on the Canadian arm manipulator, which is very germane to the space program and has made a significant contribution which redounds to the credit of Canada. I do not want to take too long in my preliminary remarks, but the report ends by quoting Dr. Kratky:

There was no warning and no consultations.

Then Dr. Clive Willis, the general secretary of the National Research Council, said that because of the number of research projects being cut:

... there is no way to do it easily.

I think we can all agree with that.

In some instances, there was no way of telling people ahead of time. It's just too difficult to do that with every group.

The report concludes by saying:

More than 200 jobs will be eliminated and dozens of research projects axed.

Could the Leader of the Government procure for this house some general statement of the government's intentions with respect to the National Research Council and the implementation of the government's announced policy to reduce the budget of the National Research Council by $20.5 million next year? It seems incredible to me that there has not been available to members of either House of Parliament, to the best of my knowledge, anything relating to the program of cuts that will relate to such an important agency as the National Research Council, in which all Canadians for many years have taken very great pride.

Could the Leader of the Government procure any kind of statement that might give us some idea as to what the result of these cuts is going to be on the National Research Council

I may state in passing that both Dr. Kerwin, the head of the NRC, and Mr. Oberle, the minister responsible, have appeared before a committee of the other place. The extent to which they have been questioned, or may have imparted information on the cuts, is something of which I cannot speak from any direct knowledge, but it appears that there was fairly extensive questioning.

In any event, I will do as the honourable senator asks and see if we can obtain a comprehensive statement of the intentions of the Council in this respect.

Senator Hicks: I thank the honourable leader, but I would point out that it is not simply this item I am interested in. I used this article only as a starting point for seeking some more general statement, and I think the Leader of the Government in the Senate recognizes that.

TRADE

IMBALANCE BETWEEN CANADA AND U.S.S.R.—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As the leader knows well, the Soviet market for Canadian grain is of very great importance. I believe that the Soviets are today buying approximately one bushel in three of Canadian wheat going into the export market. Our trade balance with the Soviet Union is so favourable, our sales sometimes going as high as $1800 million as compared to our purchases from them of perhaps $50 million or $75 million, that the Soviet Union is putting greater and greater pressure on Canadian authorities to do something to improve, from their point of view, their balance of trade with Canada.

In the last number of weeks I personally have had no less than three visits from officials of the Soviet Embassy who are pushing Canada to take some sort of action that would help bring about an improved balance of trade from their point of view. In other words, that Canadians would be buying more from the Soviet Union.

Since this market is of the utmost importance to western Canada, and even with the lower prices in the current year it may go up to $1.5 billion, I would like to inquire as to the attitude of the government in this matter, and whether or not steps can be taken to assist in improving that imbalance.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, naturally, the subject came up at the time the last grains agreement was signed between Canada and the Soviet Union. The honourable senator has referred to an imbalance in trade between us and the U.S.S.R. I am told this is in the proportion of 30 to 1. What we have done is indicate to the Soviet Union that we would do everything within our area of jurisdiction to achieve certain Soviet export targets in Canada. We thought that that was a prudent step to take, given the fact that we were seeking—and in fact obtained—a renewed Soviet commitment to purchase 25 million metric tons of Canadian grains over the next five years.

Senator Argue: Perhaps I should ask whether or not there was any particular commitment given. The term for that kind of commitment, I believe, is counter-trade. The Australians, as I understand it, have been writing in the fixed amount of counter-trade that they are ensuring that the Soviet Union will have with their country. Therefore, I am asking whether consideration has been given to the whole question of counter-trade and the giving of a more precise assurance to our very best purchasers of grain.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that is another subject. All I can say about the discussions that were held at the time is that we made no purchase commitments to them. However, we did give what might be called a “best efforts” undertaking to assist them to achieve certain export targets in Canada.

Senator Argue: I appreciate the answer given by the government leader. I have a further question, and I do not expect him to have this information at his fingertips right at the moment. I would like to ask whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate can give us some information, either now or at a later date, as to what kind of resources there are within the Department of External Affairs, whether it be a trade component or whatever, to assist in facilitating the sale of Soviet goods in Canada. I do not have precise information, but I suspect that those resources are meagre and are not particularly active, but I hope I am wrong. Therefore, I would appreciate it if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could bring to us some information on how many people are assisting in this area and what moneys have been spent in travel, et cetera. In other words, is a major effort being made in this area or is there just a perfunctory attitude that may not pay off?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think the government is agreed that the imbalance in trade is a problem, and we have given, as I have said, a “best efforts” undertaking to the Soviet Union that we would help them redress the imbalance as much as possible.

I will inquire of the Department of External Affairs to see whether they can provide to the Senate the kind of information that my honourable friend has asked for today.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

THE NORTH—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government and it concerns Canadian sovereignty in the north.

[Senator Murray.]

Yesterday I attended a meeting with officials from the Department of External Affairs. Those officials advised me and others that as of January 1 Canada took sovereignty of an area 12 miles beyond Ellesmere Island, or the islands in the north, and declared an economic zone 300 miles north of that.

During the summer I travelled with officials from NATO. At that time, officials from the Department of National Defence claimed that Canadian sovereignty extended to the North Pole and that they were trying to protect it.

Now that I have been given the policy of two departments of government, I should like to know what the government's policy is.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—PROPOSED TUNNEL, BRIDGE OR CAUSEWAY TO MAINLAND

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government and it relates to the joining of the North American continent to Prince Edward Island. I read in a local newspaper recently that construction firms have made proposals to the federal government for the building of bridges, causeways, tunnels or other modes of transportation for a permanent facility joining North America to Prince Edward Island. A decision was to be made by the Government of Canada sometime before Christmas.

Can the leader advise if anything has been decided by the Government of Canada and if such proposals are before the government?

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—NOVA SCOTIA FERRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I have one further question concerning that garden province, that million acre farm, the cradle of Confederation.

It has been said in local newspapers that because the government is anticipating making this decision before Christmas—that is, a decision on contracts to construct a permanent link—it is holding up a decision to construct ferries to be used between the province of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island at Caribou and Wood Islands.

Could the leader determine if the government is holding this decision up pending a decision on a permanent link?

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGED ABUSE OF MINISTERIAL DISCRETION

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, since he is the only senator who can answer questions because there are no other ministers or parliamentary secretaries in the Senate.

I am sure I am not the only parliamentarian who receives representations from Canadian citizens who wish to sponsor immigrants to Canada and who are told that the prospective immigrants cannot be sponsored because of the high unemployment rate in Canada, notwithstanding the fact that those sponsors are prepared to assist these people financially at the beginning so that they can later contribute to the Canadian economy.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate suggest a line of reply to defend Canada's immigration policy, in view of the fact that recently a person was admitted to this country, notwithstanding the country's high unemployment rate and notwithstanding that person's long criminal record?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): If the honourable senator is referring to the application in respect of which I had an exchange with Senator Lucier yesterday, I can say that no decision has been made on that application.

Senator Bosa: Do I understand the leader to say that this matter has not been fully decided?

Senator Murray: That man entered the country in 1979 and has since applied for citizenship. In any case, no decision has been made on the matter.

Senator van Roggen: Is the cabinet overruling the Minister of State for Immigration?

Senator Murray: The decision will be made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The Minister of State for Immigration did his duty when he informed the Minister of Employment and Immigration that the earlier disqualification affecting that application had been removed.

If my friend is talking about the case that Senator Lucier and I discussed yesterday, I repeat, no decision has been made.

Senator Bosa: I am.

Senator Murray: That is the situation.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANCELLATION OF VISIT OF VICE-PRESIDENT OF NICARAGUA

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question to ask the Leader of the Government today in view of the proposed adjournment of the Senate.

Can the Leader of the Government throw any light on the cancellation of the visit to Canada of the Vice-President of Nicaragua, particularly on the contradictory statements that seem to have been made by the Nicaraguan Ambassador and a spokesman for the Department of External Affairs respecting the status of that visit? Could the leader also tell us why it is alleged that Canada would only offer the Vice-President unofficial visitor status and would not make arrangements to have the Vice-President received in Canada's capital?

Will some effort be made, as is intimated in press reports, to reinstate the visit, because it would be unfortunate if the visit were side-tracked in light of the allegation that the United States has influenced the Government of Canada on the status accorded the visit?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am informed that the Vice-President was, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, to have made an unofficial visit to Canada from November 11 to November 16. The visit was initiated by Nicaragua and the government welcomed the opportunity to receive Dr. Ramirez.

At the request of the Nicaraguan Ambassador, the Secretary of State for External Affairs agreed to meet Dr. Ramirez. That meeting was to have taken place in Toronto, because that was the most convenient location for both gentlemen. The Secretary of State for External Affairs was looking forward to a substantive discussion on the situation in Nicaragua and in the region.

As the Leader of the Opposition has said, the visit was cancelled by Nicaragua because Dr. Ramirez felt that he was not going to be received at a sufficiently high level. I may say that an effort was made to arrange appointments for him with either the Prime Minister or the Deputy Prime Minister, but neither of those gentlemen could be available at the suggested time. The meeting was to have taken place, I may say, during the Parliamentary recess.

The Department of External Affairs went on to arrange meetings with the Minister of State for Immigration, with the Premiers of Ontario and Manitoba and with the Quebec Minister of Culture, Communities and Immigration. I am informed that the government regrets the cancellation of the visit and the loss of an opportunity for discussions on an issue which is of great concern to Canada.

Senator MacEachen: I thank the leader for that information. What remains unclear is why the visit was described as being an "unofficial visit". How does the Vice-President of Nicaragua have an "unofficial" visit with the Secretary of State for External Affairs? Presumably one can describe it as that, and that will be the case, but who decided that it be given unofficial status?

• (1500)

According to the press, the ambassador said why, from the Canadian side, it was unofficial. I would like to know for clarification—perhaps the minister cannot tell us today—why it was an unofficial visit; at whose request it was unofficial; and whether it will be possible for Canada to offer to the Vice-President access to the Prime Minister or the Deputy Prime Minister so that the visit can be reinstated, because it is unfortunate that this has happened.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will see whether something can be added to the bare bones information that has been provided by the department on this matter.

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGED ABUSE OF MINISTERIAL DISCRETION

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, my question is supplementary to that asked by Senator Bosa.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate told us that the decision on the application of the proposed immigrant would be made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. As I understand from reading the press, up to now the matter has been dealt with by the Honourable Gerry Weiner, Minister of State for Immigration.

Could the Leader of the Government provide us with some guidance as to the commission given to the Minister of State for Immigration, for example, the letter from the senior minister indicating the ambit of the Minister of State's duties and responsibilities?

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have been asked to provide three delayed answers to questions.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

CRITERIA FOR APPROVING PROPOSALS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the first delayed answer is in response to a question raised in the Senate on October 30, 1986 by the Honourable Senator Frith regarding the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency—Criteria for Approving Proposals.

Letters of eligibility are issued if four criteria are met: eligible person, eligible location, eligible activity and eligible assets. The tax credit will be granted only when the assets are acquired and in use.

[Later:]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in order that the time period between now and the next sitting of the Senate may be profitably used, I should like to ask another question on this subject.

The answer that was given described the criteria and qualified each criterion with the adjective "eligible". The difficulty with that answer is that it is the various criteria for "eligibility" that interest me. I should like more detail as to what criteria go into establishing eligibility.

Senator Doody: I shall "return the message to sender" with the annotated comments of Senator Frith and shall report further.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to follow up on this subject. My question has to do with the tax credit under which these eligibilities are established.

Can the Deputy Leader tell us how many firms have actually received the tax credit or have undertaken investments providing jobs as a result of the tax credit?

Senator Doody: I shall try to obtain that information.

INDUSTRY

AEROSPACE—AWARDING OF CF-18 SERVICE CONTRACT— REJECTION OF IMP BID—GOVERNMENT REASONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the second delayed answer I have is in response to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Graham regarding the awarding of the CF-18 Service Contract—Rejection of IMP Bid—Government Reasons.

The decision on the IMP bid for the CF-18 contract was taken on Friday, October 31. IMP was notified on this same day. IMP was judged to be non-compliant from a technical point of view. The government is not at present in a position to reveal further details of any commercial submission on any request for bids. The government is investigating the possibility of coming forward with more information. However, the agreement of all three consortia would be necessary before any more details would be made public.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, one of the questions I asked was at what point in time it was determined that IMP lacked the expertise to be a serious bidder.

As honourable senators know, we had heard the continual talk in the other place, in this chamber and in the newspapers about the serious bidders being the Winnipeg-based firm, Bristol, and the Montreal-based Canadair. Yet, the Deputy Leader of the Government tells us today that they were notified on the day that the award was made.

What concerns me is that they were allowed to carry on all of their negotiations, enhance their submission and continue the meetings when it seems quite evident that the government had already considered that IMP was not in serious contention.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): On the contract, I note that the deputy leader has said that there can be no disclosure of what is meant by "technical non-compliance" without the consent of the three bidders. That may be the case. However, it is somewhat unfair to the unsuccessful bidder in Nova Scotia to be left hanging with the vague phrase "technical non-compliance," which has disqualified that firm, particularly when the term "excellent" has been used by the Leader of the Government with respect to the two other bidders, implying that excellence exists in Montreal and Winnipeg but that Halifax is in some shadowy, obscure region of non-excellence.

I think it is a bit unfair to IMP to be shrouded in that vague description of "technical non-compliance." What is it?

Senator Doody: I will certainly make an inquiry on the senator's behalf. I would not want to give the impression that IMP was not told the reasons for its being judged non-compliant.

I gather from the comments that I read here that IMP was certainly given the reasons, but the government is not at liberty at this point to make public those reasons. However, I will try to obtain more information for the senator.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I do not want to press this unduly, but I noted that yesterday the Leader of the Government used the expression, "two excellent bids were received." That is all very well, but the implication is that "non-excellent" could be ascribed to the IMP bid. At what time did the government come to the conclusion that IMP was not a serious contender?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I will have to ask the department for more information in that regard. I have delivered the message that I received and I will now try to get it expanded upon.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: There is one other observation that relates to this matter, honourable senators. In talking about the technical incompetence of IMP—

Senator Murray: "Non-compliance"—please don't make matters worse.

Senator Frith: Nice try, though! That one almost got by.

Senator Hicks: It should be pointed out that IMP does manage to make the Aurora aircraft, which is every bit as complicated an aircraft as the CF-18. Indeed, from an electronics point of view, because it is a submarine hunter it is much more complicated than the CF-18. Therefore, I do not think that the technical argument applies at all.

Senator MacEachen: Hear, hear!

AEROSPACE—AWARDING OF CF-18 SERVICE CONTRACT TO CANADAIR—TECHNOLOGY TRANSFER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the third delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 4, 1986 by Senator Frith regarding Aerospace—Awarding of CF-18 Service Contract to Canadair—Technology Transfer.

Since the answer is lengthy and rather technical, I would ask that it be taken as read.

(The answer follows:)

Transfer of the CF-18 technology from McDonnell Douglas, its U.S.-based manufacturer, through the CF-18 system engineering support and airframe repair and overhaul contract will broaden the technological base currently existing at Canadair. Accordingly, with extensive research and development, Canadair could build on the CF-18 technology base to enhance its current and future aerospace product lines.

For example, the CF-18 airframe utilizes advanced carbon-epoxy composites assembled over conventional metal internal structures in its wings and vertical stabilizers. Current research and development has created more efficient composite materials, design techniques and production facilities that will replace the current metal internal structures with equivalent, but lighter, composite material structures. The CF-18 composite material design and fabrication technology transferred from McDonnell Douglas, complemented by further extensive research and development by Canadair, could have a significant impact on the company's future composite design and production capabilities.

The CF-18 represents the state-of-the-art in avionics, armament and sensor systems integration resulting in unmatched operational capability among current fighter aircraft. This outstanding capability was achieved through the complex integration of 25 computers programmed in 11 different languages. However, in order to advance the weapon system integration technology into the next generation, a newly developed common computer language is being used for both embedded and operational computer software.

The CF-18 weapon system integration techniques in concert with extensive research and development could result in Canadair being able to update and advance its capabilities and enhance the competitiveness of its current and projected aerospace business.

SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION—FUTURE OF PLANT

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer which I have not had the opportunity to put into the standard form. It is in response to a question asked yesterday by Senator Graham about the market study for Sysco.

The market study was conducted by A.D. Little of Canada Ltd. in 1985. It was a project carried out under the Planning Sub-Agreement of the Canada-Nova Scotia ERDA.

Sysco is updating its comprehensive business plan, and the market study is being updated by A.D. Little of Canada Ltd. as part of that process.

I believe I furnished the remainder of the information yesterday.

[Later:]

● (1510)

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I just want to raise a question with respect to the answer given by the Leader of the Government regarding the Sydney Steel Corporation and market studies. There was carried out in 1985 a first market study by A.D. Little. We are now informed that a second, updated study is being carried out by the same company. Could the Leader of the Government indicate when that study will be completed?

Senator Murray: I regret, honourable senators, that I do not have that information. I will find out.

9th October, 1986—During the months of July, August and September, 1986, how many inmates in federal penitentiaries were not granted the parole that was promised to them and to which they were entitled before the Act to Amend the Parole Act and the Penitentiary Act was passed during a special session called to this effect in July of 1986?

Reply by the Solicitor General of Canada:

The Act to Amend the Parole Act and the Penitentiary Act, adopted by Parliament July 24, 1986, does not prevent the release of offenders on parole. The Act authorizes the National Parole Board, according to established criteria, to retain in custody until warrant expiry, or place under strict residential conditions, those inmates considered likely to commit an offence causing death or serious harm to another person before the end of their sentence. It also allows the Board to grant Mandatory Supervision to certain offenders on a one chance basis, which means that if the Mandatory Supervision release is revoked the inmates will not be entitled to earn remission again.

Since the legislation was adopted and up to and including October 14, the National Parole Board has ordered 36 inmates detained; 31 have had residency requirements imposed on their Mandatory Supervision release; and, 32 have been given the one-chance option on Mandatory Supervision, for a total of 99.

CANADA PETROLEUM RESOURCES BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes moved the third reading of Bill C-5, to regulate interests in petroleum in relation to frontier lands, to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and to repeal the Canada Oil and Gas Act.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, is the sponsor of the bill not going to give us a few comments on why he believes that it ought to be given third reading now? I have one or two matters that I would like to raise, but I yield the floor to the Honourable Senator Barootes.

[Senator Graham.]

Senator Barootes: I yield the floor to Senator Olson.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, this afternoon we are faced with what I think is a very unusual situation in that the senators on the government side—in this case it was presented by Senator Balfour—have brought back a report from a committee which asks the Senate to give third reading to a bill before the committee has heard all of the evidence that is pertinent to the bill. Witnesses have been called and have apparently agreed to give evidence. At the committee meeting on Tuesday, November 18, the committee will hear from Mr. John Clink, President of Geophysical Service Inc. of Calgary, and Mr. David Bennett of the Tungavik Federation. On November 20 the committee will hear from representatives of Petro-Canada, who have not yet made representations on these bills. On that date the committee will also hear from Nova Scotia Resources Limited and COGLA, the Canada Oil and Gas Lands administration. These witnesses will deal not only with Bill C-6, which, of course, is still before the committee, but more particularly with the contents of Bill C-5.

I realize that I gave an undertaking some days ago that I was not going to object to or withhold consent to third reading of this bill today, and I will honour that undertaking. But I can tell honourable senators that if we are going to have such unusual practices as the reporting of a bill before the committee has heard all of the evidence relating to it, we will have to be very careful in giving undertakings in advance of when the consent that the government seeks is to be given.

What I think is more important than that, honourable senators, is that until yesterday afternoon most of us did not realize how serious is the situation facing us today with respect to this bill—not only with respect to this bill, unfortunately, but also with respect to the government's attitude and general policy. We are witnessing the end of the Canadian oil and gas industry as we know it today. Honourable senators were told yesterday afternoon that the two largest Canadian companies that are involved in the activity off the east coast do not believe that they can ever finish the exploration they started, even if the price of oil were to rise to $28 U.S. per barrel. Their response was straightforward and simple: In the present environment—and they were referring to government policy—there is no way in which they can persuade the private capital investment community to provide them with the funds that they need to develop the fields, to further drill out or delineate the discoveries that they have made.

I think that is a sad commentary on government policy. It means that the Government of Canada is passing over to the multinational companies the determination of Canadian oil and gas policy respecting the offshore. The President of Bow Valley, Mr. Donald Seaman, and the President of Husky, Mr. Art Price, informed the committee yesterday afternoon that they had a plan by which they would use seismic data that they had gathered in the Hibernia area and offshore Nova Scotia to try to drill certain wells to prove whether there is oil and gas capability. That is part of the development of an oil field. The next stage, of course, is to drill enough holes—what they call delineation—to find out whether they have something worth developing. The program that was in place prior to this government's policy involved petroleum incentive payments, commonly called PIP grants, to assist them in this drilling to discover whether there are some gas and oil bearing strata as a result of the seismic activity that had taken place in a certain area. They would then move into the next stage, which is the delineation of how large these findings might be. That these companies could do with the PIPs; they cannot do it by themselves.

The reason for that is very simple: We are talking about $40 million or $50 million per well in some places. Not all of the wells are that expensive, but that is a realistic cost in terms of drilling offshore wells in some of the more hostile areas off Nova Scotia and Newfoundland.

Senator Frith: That is the cheapest, you mean.

Senator Olson: It could be the cheapest, but it is still an enormous amount of money per well. I see that Senator Doody understands that. But they got cut off. They had in place a plan to do this drilling so that they could delineate an area of potential production. Then they could take that data into the private capital markets and demonstrate that they had something useful for which they could borrow funds to bring it into production. So far they have not even finished the discovery wells, let alone doing the delineation to see what they have got.

• (1520)

So, they have not even moved into the second phase. They did not even finish the first stage. They got cut off by this government. So, there is no way they can raise the kind of capital which they need to do the development—that is, drilling all of the wells, setting up production platforms, and that sort of thing—to bring it ashore and put it into the market out of their cash flow.

They now have nothing to present to the capital markets, where they would raise the money to do that. It is a pretty sad story, because those companies have invested a good deal of money. They hold those land positions, and they know very well that there is no Canadian company—apart from perhaps three, including Petro-Canada—which has sufficient cash flow to engage in this activity. So now they are stuck.

When I asked them the question directly: "Are you saying that there is no way that you can revive the activity which Husky and Bow Valley have been involved in off the east coast?", their answer was simple and direct. They said, "No, we cannot do it, because we do not have the cash flow inside our company—internally generated capital—and we do not have an asset that is sufficiently proven to demonstrate to the capital market that they would lend us the money to do it." So, they are stuck.

That is unfortunate, indeed. It is unfortunate for the hopes and aspirations of the people of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia that they might be moving into an era where there would be a great deal of wealth generated in the gas and oil fields to be found offshore. Now that is all dead.

What is equally important is that the gas and oil industry in Canada is now precluded from being part of that action. Is there any Canadian company now in the gas and oil business big enough to get itself involved in spending $40 million or $50 million per well to complete the discovery process? There may be one or two. Petro-Canada, of course, is one. But this government is on a policy kick, or whatever one might call it, and does not want Petro-Canada to have any position. In fact, Bill C-5 withdraws many of the positions which Petro-Canada had. So, it will be the multinational companies that will be involved in the rest of development of Canada's offshore, or it will not be done at all.

They went on to point out that they do not have sufficient cash flow, or they are not in a tax bracket that makes them competitive with the multinational companies. That is very important if you are not competitive, because under the changes that will be forthcoming, or which are in effect, in the income tax law, they could write off those expenses against taxable income. But if you do not have enough taxable income, you cannot write them off. But for some of the larger multinationals that are known, that are taxable, their exploration costs are about 40 per cent of the actual capital deployed, after they consider the tax write-off, and so on. But if you do not have those tax levels, then, obviously, you are in a completely different category—and that leaves out the Canadians, with the exception perhaps of Pan-Canadian, which is the Canadian Pacific Gas and Oil Company—and perhaps Gulf, or what is left of Gulf Canada. Only they would have sufficient cash flow that they would be liable for taxes and so could become competitive in this. But that is all—no one else.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Olson: Experience has demonstrated over and over again that gas and oil companies have a great deal to say about what is going to be pursued in Canada so far as gas and oil policy is concerned; but Canadian self-sufficiency in oil is no longer part of this government's policy. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has said that that is on hold. He has come with a new definition of energy self-sufficiency. In other words, it is self-sufficiency for all energy sources, including hydro. That is new.

So, we see a government that has a policy which, unfortunately, is abdicating its responsibility to set the gas and oil policy for Canada in Canada.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Olson: An honourable senator says "shame", and that is true: it is a shame. Perhaps this government will learn that if it becomes at the mercy of international companies like Exxon, International Shell in all its forms, and several others, it will not have anything to say about whether or not we do the kind of activity that is necessary—or whether we even have the capability to set oil and gas policy in Canada.

So far, honourable senators, I have been talking about the activity of bringing on more production out of the tar sands, which we know exist, because unless this government changes its attitude toward capital investment in oil and gas in Canada, no one will be interested in investing any money in it. That is the story we were told yesterday afternoon by two of the most active companies in the business.

I believe it is a disgrace. I do not want to use too harsh language because I hope that this government can be persuaded to change its views. The Senate's regional responsibilities are most important. That is why the Senate was established. We have to remind ourselves over and over again that that is why we are here, namely, to come to the defence of regions when there appears to be discrimination against some regions. We should repeatedly remind ourselves that some provinces, such as New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, would not have joined Confederation, and therefore there would have been no Canada, if they had not agreed to set up an institution to be called the Senate, with the powers which the Senate has, so that it could deal with government policy and legislation which discriminates unfavourably against some regions. Because at that time they could see that there was the possibility of some demographic shifts—

Senator Frith: Probability.

Senator Olson: Probability—that is higher. The government is now destroying all of the hopes and aspirations of those people along the east coast. It is not because the investment that was made did not show some encouraging results. For example, there is Ben Nevis where several promising wells have been drilled. Now, half way into the piece and half way into the plans to develop those projects, and to give hope and enthusiastic encouragement to the people there, they have been shot down by this government's change in policy.

It is sad, when one thinks about it, that the former Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources used to say, "Well, we have to get rid of the NEP." That was an obsession with her. Bill C-5, of course, deals with the statutory amendments. I shall not go into the details, but its purpose is to do what she said she wanted to do, completely rub out the National Energy Program. Out with that program go the hopes and aspirations for Canadian companies involved in gas and oil activity off the east coast of Canada.

Senator Frith: And it gives control to the multinationals.

Senator Olson: The only possibility of that development being revived or continuing—and we received the answers in direct reply to questions that were asked in committee—is if these companies take their land positions and farm them out to the multinationals. Otherwise, there will be no more activity. Bow Valley and Husky have one more well, and it is grandfathered after they complete the one they are working on now. That is the end. They will go to zero activity and stay there. Mr. Price, President of Husky, said to the committee that they could not go back under the present policy environment, even if oil were $28 per barrel. So, when senators opposite, including—well he is not here, so I had better not say it. Perhaps the deputy leader will carry the message to cabinet. They can sit around and blame world oil prices for the loss of activity off the east coast, but from what we heard yesterday that is simply not true. I have been told this before, but now it is on public record that these companies cannot possibly revive their activity and their plans to drill out these fields and bring them into production, even if the price of oil were at $28 per barrel, in the present policy environment.

I hope that the government will recognize that some of these commercial companies have looked hard at the numbers they require and the policy environment they need to attract capital to do these things. Otherwise, it is the end of the potential for gas and oil development off the east coast. I should also be including the Beaufort Sea, as it is not much different. Development there is also very expensive. There were some very encouraging finds there, too, but all the activity will go down to zero. Tuktoyaktuk is a dead town. It had the brightest prospects of any town in the whole of the Northwest Territories and Yukon until this government changed policy with respect to gas and oil and killed the National Energy Program.

I am not going to stand here and argue that we should reinstate the National Energy Program. But rather than kill an entire program, could not the government merely have modified it and left in place some of the elements that were good and useful to the development of Canadian resources and the maintenance of Canadian control of oil and gas policy in Canada? That is all gone now. The passing of Bill C-5 has some importance, because it changes the structure. It is the policy decision that was made before Bill C-5 was drafted that should be amended. The same state of inactivity applies to western Canada. There may be some drilling in the sedimentary basin and maybe a few more thousand barrels of oil will be found, but the large expensive increases to Canadian oil production—namely, from heavy oil and tar sands—will simply not happen, because the kind of investment required is not available under the present policy environment of this government. There is no consideration whatever for Canadian self-sufficiency. That is no longer part of government policy.

Members of the Senate have a regional responsibility to take up such matters. I think it is sad that we have Canadian companies, many of which are in my region, in Calgary—both Husky and Bow Valley are from Calgary, and, as I said before, they are the major Canadian players, along with Petro-Canada, of course, off the east coast—winding up. They will drill one more well that has been grandfathered, and that is it. These companies have invested millions of dollars of their own money on top of what has been paid by PIP, and now they will lose it or, at least, there will be no further activity and no way for them to recover that investment under the present policy environment.

This action will hurt these companies in other respects. They are laying off people. The President of the Newfoundland Oil Industry was before us, Mr. Robert Strong. As I recall—and I must draw on my memory because we have not received the report of the committee for that day yet—he told us that they had built up a fairly good infrastructure and support system for offshore oil drilling there. Now it is gone. They face the prospect of their businesses going down to zero. They will have to lay off everybody. They have no way of even paying the debt service charges on what they owe. That will all go back to nothing. The chairman of the Offshore Trade Association of Nova Scotia also appeared before the committee and he gave us the same story. For several years now such companies have been obtaining ships and acquiring and building expertise so that they would have the capability to service these offshore oil rigs and any development that would result from the activity. Now he says that they have nothing left. Employment has already been reduced by two thirds, and the prospects are that in another eight months at the outside, most likely six months, the entire infrastructure of the support system will be down to zero. It is a sad story. It did not have to happen.

The government could have provided the funding necessary to keep the incentive programs going until these companies finished their plans for delineating these oil fields. The next stage is even more expensive, the development of oil fields that have been delineated. However, that stage would not be funded by government coffers, nor was that the intention. When these companies reach the stage where they have the asset to lay before the investment community, they can raise the funds to develop it. However, they have been stopped short of acquiring assets sufficient to secure development funds. That is where we are at. As I said, whether or not we pass Bill C-5 does not matter greatly. It is government policy that has to be changed and changed drastically. Otherwise, Canadian companies will lose all this investment. That is bad enough, but think of all the unemployment that will flow from those lost investments. However, I think the Government of Canada is going to lose control completely of the development of gas and oil in Canada, especially on the Canada Lands. I think Senator Barootes is trying to say something. I hope he is agreeing with me.

Therefore, I plead with the senators opposite, who obviously have more influence with the government than I have, to have this policy changed in order that we do not kill our whole industry completely. I understand that when international oil prices are down, there is a slowdown in development. That is not hard to understand, but surely we cannot go on with a policy such as this, where we transfer the entire influence on Canadian gas and oil policy over to some international market. It does not matter who sets that price in the international market. It may be the Persian Gulf States; it may be OPEC, or whoever. But we must see a change in attitude towards the gas and oil policy by the Canadian government so that investors will feel confident that there will be a regime in place long enough for them to have at least a chance of getting a reasonable return on their investment.

At the present time that is not apparent; in fact, the complete opposite effect is apparent and, consequently, there is no way the developers in this field can attract any further private capital and, therefore, their investment will go down to zero.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a few remarks to make, not so much with respect to Bill C-5 which Senator Barootes will be speaking to but with respect to the opening comments of Senator Olsen, which I interpret to be a form of castigation and criticism of me for bringing in this report before the balance of the witnesses, as he said, have been heard from. The fact of the matter is that there are two bills before the committee; the fact is also that I was the deputy chairman of the committee and I had been instructed by Senator Olson's colleague, Senator Hastings, who left the country yesterday, that there had been discussions and that there was a disposition to report Bill C-5 yesterday.

In due course a motion was put to me as deputy chairman that the bill be reported without amendment. There were four senators present who voted. Three of those senators were Liberal senators; two from the maritimes and one from the Arctic. They voted in favour of the motion and I simply did my duty as the deputy chairman of the committee. I take exception to the remarks made by Senator Olson at the beginning of his address.

Senator Olson: I understand that, but I regret that I agreed to it.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, I want to take this opportunity to say that I appreciate the remarks made by Senator Olson. I appreciate the breadth and depth of his experience in these matters, particularly as they affect his province. I must say that if I had been the parent of the National Energy Program, I, too, would feel defensive of my own child. I doubt if anyone who was associated with that great undertaking could feel anything but that. It is not in the nature of things to renounce our own kin.

I must say to Senator Olson that I agree wholeheartedly with him; that I would like to support him and I wish that every senator here would give thought to his expression of our position as representatives of regions of Canada. If there is some time and some place for this august body, it would be that we have the opportunity to put aside from time to time our partisan beliefs, if you will, and our affiliations of a political nature and work toward those things that are beneficial for the regions which we represent. I wholeheartedly support any such effort.

I would like also to mention that in speaking of the new regime, if I may use that term—and it is a generality—it is one that was promised; it is one that the petroleum industry of Canada supported and it is one that they support to this very day. In fact, it was after Senator Olson had unfortunately left the committee that I put that question to the President of Husky in respect to the NEP, the PIPS and the PGRT, and he agreed, as indeed I believe did the Bow Valley representatives, that they were in favour of the dismantling, should I say, of the National Energy Program. They were highly critical of it as it existed, even though they prospered under it.

I should again point out that the idea of self-sufficiency has not been abandoned by this government, and the industry looks forward to the establishment of self-sufficiency, whether it be in energy or in oil, for Canada by Canadians.

Senator Olson pointed out that two of the largest Canadian companies involved on the east coast were represented yesterday. Of course, the largest Canadian company involved out there on the east coast is Petro-Canada rather than these two companies which are of moderate size. I am sure you will hear the same idea from Mobil, from PetroCan, and from everybody else, but I contend that the major problem is not a change in the regime; it is not the destruction of PIPS; it is not the alleviation of the PGRT, but the drastic, sudden and unexpected drop in the price of oil per barrel. None of these projects is very viable at $10 or $12 per barrel of oil. In fact, I must say to you that not all of the explorers are as pessimistic as my two friends who appeared before the committee yesterday. I have an article here written by Mobil Oil who say they are encouraged at the present time, and I think that in the course of the next few weeks we will hear from them as they undertake further development in the Hibernia field along with their partners.

I will now state my belief—and at this stage I suppose it is a belief, but it may also turn out to be a prediction—that as prices rise, which they inevitably will, we will see a restoration of activity in the east coast. I believe that the delineation of those early pools of oil will be completed and that some day in the not too distant future we will see delivery of oil from Hibernia, from Ben Nevis, from Terra Nova, and from all these areas.

Further, it is my fond hope that that oil will ultimately be delivered to Come-By-Chance, and perhaps to a refinery in Canso, so that the prosperity of the maritimes can be enhanced by this natural resource which will ultimately be so difficult and costly to develop. However, I predict that it will be developed.

Senator Olson spoke about the incentives that have been removed for drilling under the new regime in respect of tax credits and royalty relief. I say to Senator Olson that those incentives are as favourable today for Canadian companies as they are for the multi-nationals. The problem posed to us is the fact that many of the Canadian companies do not have tax credits and the cash flow with which to make these undertakings. Let me tell you that Mr. Price said yesterday that he wanted a neutral regime, one that was equally favourable to all companies, whether Canadian or multinational. The new incentive is as helpful to Canadian companies as it is to foreign or multinational companies.

For those few companies like BVI, and maybe Husky to a certain extent, that are not able to use the new tax credit, the tax benefits under the Exploration Tax Credit, let it be known, are refundable to them in cash up to 40 per cent. As well, under the Western Accord, the government allows unused income tax write-offs to become deductible against the old PGRT. Both of these measures will be very helpful to non-tax-paying companies, which is what was explained to us yesterday.

In fact, if you look at it precisely, the broad investment tax credit provisions in the Income Tax Act are 20 per cent refundable for large companies, but 40 per cent refundable for small companies. So, there is an incentive for our smaller Canadian companies to participate.

[Senator Barootes.]

I should point out some other information that should be helpful and will, I think, ultimately restore the activity that we all want. Companies doing exploration on frontiers will have their cost in Canada reduced to approximately 40 cents on each dollar that they expend. Yesterday the two gentlemen who appeared before the committee representing Bow Valley Industries and Husky Oil said specifically that under the old PIP regime they were spending 30 cents of each dollar out of their pocket. The new regime makes it approximately 40 cents out of each dollar, but look at how that compares to frontier exploration that is being done in other countries. For example, explorers of similar nature working in the United States have to expend 54 cents of each exploration dollar out of their own treasury; in the United Kingdom, 60 cents for the North Sea explorers; in Australia, 54 cents; in Norway, 49 cents. Canadian exploration companies are expending out of their pocket only 40 cents. It is not quite as good as the 30 cents it used to be, but 40 cents is not bad. I myself would be most pleased to undertake exploration on the east coast if someone were to give me 100 cents on the dollar, but 40 cents is not a bad bargain.

I believe that as prices rise, we will see more activity in these areas, and as that exploration is restored, I think we can restore the economy, the confidence and, I hope, the recovery of oil from the east coast, from the Arctic, from the Beaufort, as well as continuing our exploration in the western sedimentary basin.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Cogger, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, for an Address to Her Excellency the Governor General in reply to Her Speech at the opening of the Session.—(Honourable Senator Doyle). (7th day of resuming debate).

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I am surprised the Speaker was able to find me. Since I last spoke in this chamber the seating arrangements have been changed. I might say I am now in the enviable position of having a medical doctor to the left of me and a medical doctor to the right of me. I have a feeling that somebody is trying to send me a message. Whether it is the deputy leader, the whip, or both, I will take it into account, and I will also take into account the wisdom with which I am surrounded, and I will be most cautious to make few references to matters obtaining to health.

Senator Frith: It is just their politics you should worry about!

Senator Doyle: I think I will not get a quarrel from either gentleman if I restate the old fact that if you do not use a muscle, it atrophies. For that reason, I try to keep my hand in, or my nose in, as it were, investigative reporting. However, on this occasion I must report to my leader utter failure in my attempts to determine how the Honourable Senator Heath Macquarrie builds his podium. I know a good deal about his platform, but nothing about his podium, that dazzling collection of books, periodicals and pamphlets that he assembles on his desk to support the notes for whatever speech he may be making in the Senate. It teeters a bit, leans a lot and, in the galloping passages, slides towards Senator Balfour. But his podium hangs on to the hallelujah finish, and while the applause still lingers it is dismantled. Snoopers are foiled in all efforts to examine its parts, perhaps a great dictionary—the Oxford, of course—maybe a book of famous quotations, the biographies of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, a slim volume of the secrets of Anna Pavlova, the unexpurgated collection of promises to Atlantic Canada and, of course, the Bible.

When Senator Macquarrie built himself a podium last week for his participation in this debate, I thought it might have been appropriate for him to include in his stack the collected speeches of Senator Duff Roblin and the annotated reports of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, autographed by Senator Lowell Murray. I thought that might have been appropriate, because a number of us have been using this occasion to extend our congratulations to those two fine leaders of the government.

Without a podium of my own to teeter, lean or slide towards Senator Barootes, I can only express my personal gratitude for patience within caucus and example in this chamber.

● (1600)

Honourable senators, it is a great honour for me, a very junior senator, to be given the opportunity to speak in this debate on the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and I shall do so with whatever humility I can muster.

Humility, as I have observed it, does not always come easily in this chamber, and it is particularly difficult to sustain when intellect and intuition combine to inform you that the government has acted wisely and sensitively in describing the thrust of its agenda for this new session of Parliament. Humility here must be mixed with regret—regret that some members of Parliament who sit in their redoubt opposite can see no good in the Speech.

I did listen carefully to the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, the Honourable Allan MacEachen, when he spoke a few weeks ago. I am sorry he is unable to be with us at this moment. While I would not presume to weigh the worth of his rhetoric—Senator Murray did such a good job of that—I cannot ignore one of his observations on the Throne Speech. With his wonderful gift for understatement, the Honourable Leader of the Opposition had this to say:

Priorities and policies have become fuzzy and diluted; the government has dropped all pretensions of offering this country leadership and now offers instead an unpalatable mush of generalities. So unpalatable is the mush that has been served up that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has himself disowned the Speech from the Throne. Of course, I hesitate to point out in making that comment that an eminent journalist has told us:

Sitting in the Chamber near the Speaker's Chair was the man substantially responsible for the Speech, Lowell Murray, the Government Leader in the Senate.

The Honourable Marcel Masse has said:

I am one of those who, if I may be allowed to have personal views, wonders what's the use of this business.

And Senator MacEachen adds:

If that is the confidence the government has in its own efforts, then I say, "What's the use?"

That is the end of the quotation and that, honourable senators, is the end of Senator MacEachen's account of how high hopes have turned to mush.

Praise be, it is not the only account of the minister's remarks. On October 5 Richard Cleroux of The Globe and Mail gave another account.

Senator Frith: What newspaper was that?

Senator Doyle: I believe I said The Globe and Mail, but I will check that. Strangely enough, it was The Globe and Mail!

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Doyle: To continue, honourable senators, Richard Cleroux of The Globe and Mail gave this account:

While there may have been a reason for a Throne Speech 150 years ago, (Mr. Masse) said, "We should ask ourselves now, do we still have a reason?"

He said that because a Throne Speech is read by a head of state rather than an elected party leader, it has to remain above partisan considerations and deal with broad outlines of forthcoming legislation, programs or new items.

The result, Mr. Masse said, is that it ends up couched in generalities. "And everybody says the speech is vague."

Moreover, a government does not control the House of Commons agenda and therefore some pledges are not fulfilled. They are repeated in the next Throne Speech, "and people say they were just warmed over."

Mr. Masse suggested taking a lesson from the Quebec model.

Honourable senators, I seem to have misplaced that part of my speech which is a continuation of the quotation in which Mr. Cleroux went on to say that the Quebec model had some merit, that in the French model the lieutenant governor appears before the legislature, receives the greetings of the legislature and the loyalty intended for the sovereign, wishes the legislature well in its deliberations, and then departs. Later, in the proper place, the premier makes his report to the province on the business of the session.

I ask: Is it scandalous for a minister of the Crown to question the form of the Speech from the Throne or to ponder a way of dealing with the government's statement of intentions that might enhance credibility at a small cost to tradition? Is it scandalous for a veteran politician to pluck one or two words, or even three or four words, from a minister's mouth, leave them in a free fall from context in an effort to make mush of the issues in debate?

A headline writer, having nothing more to go on than that, could be forgiven for putting this on the next day's front page, "Masse disowns Mulroney, MacEachen tells all."

Orland French, a columnist who knows a good deal about the regions of this country, wrote this the other day:

Politicians keep fuelling cynicism every day. And so do the media.

A rare vice-regal view of the Speech from the Throne might have caused a sensation had it been printed when it was given by a great Liberal who was Governor General when he included the next lines in a speech to the Press Gallery 30 years ago. This is Vincent Massey speaking. I can hear him now. He said:

● (1610)

I have a stern Prime Minister beside me
Waxing in stature, growing ever wiser.
(And this is well, for he is my adviser!)
Lots of advisers have I got, comprising
Over a score—and how they love advising!
Each year they give me their combined advice
On plans to implement—or put on ice.
Their views I give you, seated on The Throne,
Reading the pages in a level tone.
Under their orders, I can have no choice,
The country hears me as His Master's Voice,
Transmitting policies that are not mine;
I'm just an old TransCanada pipeline!
But once the Speech is finished, I must own,
I use a large blue pencil, all alone;
Just how, no one must know, whate'er his mission
With either Government or Opposition!
Over the years the Speech seems always longer—
And so the reader must grow ever stronger—
Not mentally; his efforts must be towards
Keeping the vigor of his vocal chords.
He plagues his listeners from sea to sea.
Some of them listen in captivity;
Helpless they sit, and hear from first to last
The endless list of bills that will be passed.

Mr. Massey was saying that the Speech from the Throne is an imperfect vehicle from the point of view of the advisers who prepare it; it is a ludicrous chore for the person who must read it. All the symbolic purposes of vice-regal or royal participation in the opening of Parliament could be served—probably better served—by ceremonies devised to underline and emphasize our loyalty to the Throne. The gracious presence here of the present Governor General, of which Senator Barootes spoke so eloquently, need not involve her being heard as "Her Master's Voice transmitting policies that are not mine." And the 20 advisers—a few more nowadays—could concentrate on commitments and details the Prime Minister might include in his report, to the consternation of those who sit in opposition. Critics would have more to chew on than counting words or paragraphs to divine the government's priorities or sincerity. Certainly, there should be no taboo in arguing the point.

[Senator Doyle.]

Within the traditional limitations imposed by the necessary acknowledgment that the Governor General should not be asked to make political points for the government, the Speech from the Throne delivered in this chamber last month was heartening to most of us who heard it and to most of those who examined its text with open minds.

Of course, it did not cover everything—I looked in vain for any direct reference to the importance of breathing out and breathing in. Some matters of great concern were dealt with most succinctly. For instance, it hardly seemed necessary at this time to dwell again on the imperative of sustaining Canada's relationship with the United States. This, of course, opened a door to those critics who weigh Throne Speeches by the measure of how many sentences are devoted to this or how many paragraphs are given to that.

What this Speech from the Throne did labour, as my colleague, the Honourable Michel Cogger, emphasized at the beginning of this debate, were the twin virtues of consistency and continuity.

The speech recalled that the government, two years before, had been given a national mandate for reform. It had undertaken the tasks of national reconciliation, economic renewal, social justice and constructive internationalism.

Today my Ministers believe these goals are within reach.

read the Right Honourable Governor General.

We live today in a world of increasing uncertainty and interdependence. We live in a world where unforeseen events, both at home and abroad, demand flexibility and adaptiveness.

Although my Government will remain sensitive to changing circumstances, it is determined to pursue these national objectives in the confidence that their fulfillment will bring lasting benefit to all Canadians.

John Ferguson, in an analysis of the speech for Southam News, saw the business of flexibility and changing circumstances as a hedge. "For that," wrote Ferguson, "read 'We'll do our best, but we won't be able to do everything.'"

Well, that is fair enough, whether the so-called "hedge" is attributed to troubles in the popularity polls or "policy on the fly." The Prime Minister, speaking in the other place two days later, declared with great candour:

"We have never said that the record would be perfect. We never campaigned on a platform of perfection. All we said was that we would work hard in a serious, sustained way to try to improve the lot of all Canadians.

Well said. But would it not be asking too much to have the Governor General read out "My Ministers aren't perfect" or, even in Mr. Ferguson's words, have the good lady declaim that her ministers "won't be able to do everything"?

However, their capacity to do a great deal can be measured in the record of what they have already done. Senator Murray made much of that record and so did Senators Cogger and Barootes, who must be congratulated on their presentations of the resolution before us.

Some indication of what remains to be done, or at least attempted, has been placed before us in this debate with great vigour by Senators Nurgitz, MacDonald, Macquarrie, Atkins and Simard. Senator Hicks' reasoned arguments deserved the attention they received from both sides of this house, as did the impassioned case for the disadvantaged made by the Honourable Brenda Robertson. Too many members of the Senate missed that speech when it was given Thursday afternoon. I can only commend them to Hansard, where some of the fire that kindled the delivery may be missing, but not the facts that fed the fire.

Minister Masse may argue that the Speech from the Throne is an imperfect instrument, and I may agree with him. But this Throne Speech has prompted intelligent and constructive discussion of our future course and it is bound to make an impact of consequence.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Olson, debate adjourned.

"A PEOPLE APART—NATIVES IN SASKATOON"

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Buckwold calling the attention of the Senate to a special report by the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix entitled "A People Apart—Natives in Saskatoon".—(Honourable Senator Marchand, P.C.).

● (1620)

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, when I adjourned the debate yesterday, I was in full flight when it was necessary for the house to adjourn to give Royal Assent to a bill. So, I will try to generate some of the fire that I had yesterday following the excellent address by my colleague, Senator Buckwold. I do not plan to keep honourable senators here for too long.

When I completed my remarks yesterday, I was referring to what the Senate did in the past and I was beginning to set out what it might do in the future. I referred to self-government and to some of the recommendations that arose from the special joint committee which reported on June 22, 1948. I was about to quote one of the recommendations, and I propose to do that now. I commended the work done by Keith Penner and I endorsed the recommendation dealing with self-government. The report of 1948 said:

That such Reserves as become sufficiently advanced to be then recommended for incorporation within the terms of the Municipal Acts of the province in which they are situate;

That was an attempt at self-government, at giving the people independence. But there was one serious flaw in that it suggested that the provinces should have some jurisdiction over Indian people. That is a flaw that we cannot forget. The Indian people of this country, today, do not want to come under the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Honourable senators will recall that at the last constitutional conference the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, tried to make some kind of a deal with the provinces to get them to take some responsibility. Perhaps he should have been briefed a little better and told more about the facts of life, that our people do not want to come under any kind of jurisdiction of the provincial governments. That is a fundamental part of it, and it is a flaw in the recommendation to which I referred. I am sure that the Prime Minister, the next time around, will be a lot wiser in understanding the desires of native people regarding self-government. The basis must be a constitutional amendment that will recognize their right to self-government, because that is what they want.

The Constitution now provides that the federal government has jurisdiction with respect to Indians and Indian land, and the Indian people do not want to change that relationship. That is basic. So, in any future discussions, that must be remembered.

The following is another recommendation:

That greater responsibility and more progressive measures of self government of Reserve and Band affairs be granted to Band Councils, to assume and carry out such responsibilities;

I can agree with that. Some of it has been done. There have been some good examples of self-government. Earlier this year we had the Sechelt self-government bill, namely, Bill C-93. In my remarks at the time I acknowledged that in that bill there were some good powers given to the band council and the band. That is part of the direction in which we have to go.

When I spoke earlier I referred to the Youth Committee's report, which recommended that there should be a standing Senate committee on native issues. At a later date I will propose that such a committee be set up. I believe that we have the talent on both sides of the chamber. Certainly, we have the time and the commitment. I believe also that there is a lot of goodwill on both sides of the house whereby we can make a contribution toward solving many of the problems.

A key part of the Penner committee's report on self-government was the fact that representatives from the native community were ex officio members of that committee. That is what made it so acceptable in the final analysis. They were part of the committee and were able to participate in the work of the committee on a day-to-day basis and give guidance on how the committee should function. They made a worthwhile contribution to the report.

However, there are many more things that need to be done. The agenda is long, and we cannot do everything in a short time. There are many issues in the country today where voices are crying out and are not being heard. A lot of misunderstanding exists.

One of the most serious issues, on which there is a good deal of misunderstanding, concerns the whole question of aboriginal rights—which involves aboriginal title, claims, and so on. The words go on. The situation last year concerning the Haida in the Queen Charlottes is a prime example. In my home town I spoke to a fellow who was cutting his lawn. In essence, he said, “What the hell do you Indians want? I don’t really agree with a lot of the things that you are putting forward.” They tell us, “Quit your crying.” However, that is not the general attitude of most Canadians. Many people have come to me and said, “I agree with what the Haidas are putting forward. Let us get busy and try to settle it.”

Last Christmas an opinion poll was taken concerning the Haida issue, and I was happy to see that 50 per cent of the people of British Columbia sided with the Haida. That is a pretty good average. I would like to see a Senate committee tackle this issue as one of the first items on the agenda. Those who appeared before the Youth Committee did not repeat a lot of the old rhetoric. Much of what they said was very basic, and that tempered many of the recommendations that were made. There were approximately five basic recommendations, one being that the committee recommended that it would like to see the claims settled, and the question of aboriginal rights dealt with. Therefore, I believe that the Senate, sitting in committee with ex officio members, could make a lasting contribution in the whole area of native issues.

As I have said, the agenda is long. In the field of education, great strides have been made during the past 20 years. In the late 1950s approximately 20 status Indian students attended university. During the past year something like 4,000 attended university. Many native people have now become educated—lawyers, teachers and others. That has been achieved by various ways and means. I applauded the Honourable Otto Lang, the former Minister of Justice. It was under his direction that the Native Law Program was set up in Saskatoon. Basically, that program gave recognition to the fact that there were a lot of talented young native people who did not have the basic education to go on to university and to become lawyers. This program provided an opportunity whereby they could take courses over a period of time and, if they qualified, go on to regular university training and obtain a law degree.

● (1630)

The Native Indian Teachers Education Program of British Columbia worked on the same basis. They recognized that there were talented native people who did not have the basic education to get a teaching degree but who had the ability. Under that program, special arrangements were made for students to upgrade themselves. If successful, they would go on to get their degrees at the University of British Columbia, in this case. Simon Fraser University had a similar program. We are now in the process, through the Faculty of Agriculture, of setting up similar courses in resource areas. In the beginning the course was to be for agriculture alone, but we suggested that it be broadened to include all the resources, such as forestry, wild life, zoology, botany, and so on. These programs are examples of some of the things that can be done in education.

However, as Senator Buckwold pointed out yesterday, the accomplishments in education leave a lot to be desired. I wish the Leader of the Government in the Senate were present so that I could make a special plea to him with regard to education in the province of British Columbia. The federal grants to the provincial Department of Education for native students attending provincial schools are made under what is called the Master Tuition Agreement. At either the end or the beginning of every school year, heads are counted and a payment is made on the basis of the per capita cost to the provincial government. This is fine in terms of payments for kids so that they can go to school. However, it is also where the power lies. The federal government really does not have much influence in terms of provincial policy as regards our people. The policy of the Province of British Columbia, and the other provinces for that matter, has been lacking, particularly in understanding what our people need and what our people are all about. If the leader were here, I would ask him to support the request by the leadership of the native people of the province of British Columbia to dismantle this agreement soon, before the next renewal date at the end of May. Do it now. It would be a great move.

Instead of making payments directly to the Government of British Columbia, the payments should go to the bands or tribal organizations. There are some very competent and able band governments and tribal administrations, and they could handle these kinds of money transfers from the federal government. Because the money is where the power lies, these administrations could negotiate with the provinces, in this case the education departments, for the kind of education that our people require within the provincial system. This would be a great contribution, and I hope that he will look at the idea and do as I ask.

In the recent election, Premier Vander Zalm said that he would be forming a commission on education. Of course, this matter falls under provincial jurisdiction, but I hope that he does. I think that it would be a good move. There has been so much turmoil in education in British Columbia in the past few years because of cuts by his predecessor. The confrontation between educators and government was awful, and it has left a bad taste in the mouths of many people. I do not deny that some cuts were necessary. The economy of the province of British Columbia is in pretty bad shape. We have 12 to 14 per cent unemployment, and for a province as productive as British Columbia that is pretty bad. So, I can understand the desire to make cuts. However, it could have been done in a different way so that there was not the confrontation that arose, particularly that in the field of education. I wrote to the new premier and suggested that he include some of our people in that proposed commission. The work they could do would make a lasting contribution to the future of education for our people in that province. I hope that Bill Vander Zalm will listen to me and take heed of my letter. Honourable senators, I could go on, but that is the gist of the message that I wanted to bring forward.

We in the Senate have a responsibility, and the Constitution is very clear on the question of legislative responsibility to Indians. We at the federal level have the exclusive right to legislate with respect to Indians and Indian lands. I hope that I receive support from both sides of the chamber to set up a committee on native affairs so that we can do more of the work that we are capable of doing.

Before I close, I would like to mention one more thing. Yesterday I talked about the contribution of the media. I described it as being, to a large degree, hit-and-miss and sensational. I also mentioned that I had seen some very good work over the years. An example of good work that I saw in the late sixties, through the seventies and into the eighties was that of a reporter by the name of George Mortimer of the Toronto Globe and Mail. His dogged, digging style was very good, and he made a real contribution in the way he wrote his articles. He went out to communities and reservations and dug up the background on what people were all about, the background on what the issues were all about. George Mortimer did not write only one article and then drop the topic. He wrote a series of articles over a period of years. He is an example of what I mean by a good reporter doing good work and providing good press. Another such reporter was Ron Rose of the Vancouver Sun. He was a little later than George Mortimer. He did not write sensationalism. He was a lot like Mortimer, hard nosed and hard working. He went out to the community meetings, talked to ministers, to MPs and obtained the facts and the necessary background. He was a very knowledgeable reporter and he made a real contribution. The articles of these two reporters are fine examples of what can be done by good press, by good hardworking reporters who are willing to dig into the facts and do the work.

In any event, honourable senators, I hope that once I have done my homework and brought forward a proposal to establish a standing Senate committee on native issues, I will get support from all sides of the house.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of Senator Marchand. He may have already mentioned this, and I missed it, but I was wondering how the ex officio members were selected for the Penner Committee on self-government?

Senator Marchand: It was done, by and large, in consultation with the committee and the organizations. In other words, the organizations put forward people and the selection was done in consultation and was mutually agreed upon.⁽¹⁾

On motion of Senator Adams, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCES AND TECHNOLOGY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO CONTINUE STUDY OF CONSULTATION PAPER ON CHILD AND ELDERLY BENEFITS

Hon. Arthur Tremblay rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, November 4, 1986:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to continue the study undertaken in 1985-1986 on the Consultation Paper on Child and Elderly Benefits, issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare, tabled in the Senate on 5th February, 1985, and to report thereon;

That the papers and evidence taken on the subject and the work accomplished during the First Session of the Thirty-third Parliament be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than Tuesday, 22nd December, 1987.

He said: Honourable senators, I shall be very brief and shall even forgo rereading the text of my motion. This motion already appears in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

I shall simply explain the meaning of this motion. Its purpose is to authorize the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology to continue consideration of the consultation paper on child and elderly benefits begun during the previous session.

This work was undertaken over a year ago. It resulted in a first interim report tabled around December, if I recall correctly. This interim report was of great inspiration and usefulness during the discussion on the bill on family allowances and on other occasions.

Last summer, we asked our research staff to continue to assemble the material required to pursue the examination we had already undertaken. My motion asks the agreement of the Senate to continue our work. It is therefore made in a spirit of continuity to further our understanding of certain issues, such as child benefits and the whole issue of the situation of families as far as child support is concerned. Honourable senators, those are the explanations that I wanted to give.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE TO STUDY DOCUMENT ENTITLED "A STUDY TEAM REPORT TO THE TASK FORCE ON PROGRAM REVIEW (NIELSEN TASK FORCE)—SERVICE TO THE PUBLIC—VETERANS"—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall, pursuant to notice of November 5, 1986, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the Document entitled: "A Study Team Report to the Task Force on Program Review (Nielsen Task Force)—Service to the Public—Veterans", dated May 1985, tabled in the Senate on 12th March, 1986, and also matters arising from the report as well as any subjects of interest to the present and future requirements of Canada's veterans; and

That the Committee present its report no later than 1st September, 1987.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question with respect to this motion. I would like to ask, first, whether or not this is a continuation of a study that was already under way. Second, I would like to ask if there is any budget requirement by the committee to undertake the study proposed in this motion.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, this is a new reference to the Nielsen Task Force report. That makes it a new subject and there is no budget.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 25, 1986 at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, on behalf of the government I wish to thank honourable senators for having responded on such short notice to the call to assemble today to deal with a matter of urgent public importance. The matter in question, of course, is a labour dispute at west coast ports which could have very grave consequences for Canada's export trade. The government has therefore moved to legislate an end to the dispute.

The situation at the moment is that there is a bill being debated in the other place, and there is an order of the House of Commons that at 4.45 this afternoon all questions will be put to dispose of that bill.

Honourable senators are aware that several Senate committees are scheduled to meet this afternoon—the Foreign Affairs Committee, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee and, I believe, the Energy Committee.

There have been some discussions between the leadership on both sides as to the course we should follow. I believe we are agreed that the appropriate procedure is to adjourn until approximately 5.15 this afternoon, at which time, if all goes as expected, we will have before us Bill C-24. Senator Doody, the Deputy Leader of the Government, will be ready at 5.15 p.m. to move second reading, and if the opposition is ready and willing to proceed shortly thereafter, we could then go into Committee of the Whole. I have asked the Minister of Labour, the Honourable Pierre Cadieux, to stand by in my office from 5.15 p.m. to appear before the Committee of the Whole, if necessary. We will be seeking consent of the Senate to proceed with the bill in all its stages so that the bill can receive Royal Assent later this evening.

I may say that it is the intention of the government to propose that the Senate adjourn, when it disposes of that bill, to Tuesday, November 25, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

If what I have just said represents the understanding of the leadership opposite and is agreeable to all honourable senators, I would propose that the Senate adjourn to the call of the bell at approximately 5.15 this afternoon.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Please proceed.

Senator Murray: The Leader of the Opposition has invited me to go ahead and do that, so I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 5.15 this afternoon.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I am quite agreeable to that proposal. We could have held the Senate for an hour or so for Question Period, but inasmuch as there are several committees which are slated to meet at 2 o'clock, I think it appropriate to adjourn now so that they can meet as scheduled, and we can deal with business later, if that is a constructive way to proceed.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to make one comment. I appreciate what the Leader of the Government has said about the process—that is, going into Committee of the Whole and the fact that the Minister of Labour is standing by—but I wonder if he would give us an undertaking that he will provide us with the background material—that is, the circumstances leading up to the lockout—so that we could look at this somewhat carefully between now and the projected time of our resuming the sitting later this day. It would expedite the passage of the bill at that time, and if there is such material prepared—and I presume that there is—it would help if we could have it. So, I would ask the Leader of the Government if he could give us an undertaking to that extent.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the sponsor of the bill, my colleague Senator Doody, has indicated that such information is available. I will see that it is given to the honourable senator and, if possible, distributed to all honourable senators immediately.

Senator MacEachen: Very well.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.15 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

MAINTENANCE OF PORTS OPERATIONS BILL, 1986

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-24, to provide for the maintenance of ports operations.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, the Canada Labour Code provides a framework for the conduct of collective bargaining in federal industries, and for the most part these industries compose an essentially public-interest jurisdiction involving key transportation and communications activities that are vital to the economy of our country and the well-being of its citizens.

The thrust of the Canada Labour Code places the prime responsibility for bargaining and resolving disputes on the parties themselves. However, it is recognized that they may require help in what may at times prove to be a complex task. The code, therefore, provides for conciliation and mediation procedures which may be invoked to assist the parties in reaching their ultimate goal of concluding or renewing a collective agreement. It is only as a very last resort that governments should intervene in the collective bargaining process.

However, honourable senators, today we find ourselves faced with a situation in which the British Columbia Maritime Employers' Association and the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union are engaged in a dispute that has reached the last resort stage. The parties failed in their efforts to resolve the dispute in direct negotiations between themselves, and subsequently failed to take full advantage of the range of expert conciliation that was extended to them.

Following a breakdown in their negotiations in early October, the employer exercised its legal right to impose a lockout, which was lifted after three days in an effort to promote further bargaining. On October 29 the Minister of Labour appointed two mediators to assist in the negotiations. On November 14 the Minister of Labour personally appealed to the parties to resolve their dispute. Nevertheless, the parties remained deadlocked.

Honourable senators, the inability of the parties to resolve their dispute, indeed, their wilful abdication of their responsibility to one another and to the Canadian public has forced the government to bring about a conclusion to a work stoppage which the economy of this country can little stand to bear. The recently concluded work stoppage at Thunder Bay has delayed grain exports, and this government is not prepared to stand idly by and see the livelihood of Canada's grain producers placed in further jeopardy by a lengthy work stoppage at west coast ports.

In addition to the damage which a lengthy work stoppage would cause to Canada's reputation as a reliable exporter of grain, the business community and its employees depend upon water transportation for shipment of goods and resources. They are also subject to undue hardship as a result of this work stoppage. We are thus faced with a situation in which the parties to the dispute are able to inflict more punishment on innocent third parties than on one another.

• (1720)

Before providing honourable senators with the details of this particular labour dispute, I wish to make it clear that this government remains totally committed to the process of free collective bargaining and holds the belief that the common well-being can best be encouraged through the constructive settlement of disputes through meaningful negotiation.

Part V of the Canada Labour Code establishes a framework of rights and responsibilities within which management and organized labour are to conduct their relations. That framework places the responsibility for resolving labour-management disputes clearly on the parties to collective bargaining. The Labour Code provides for a complete range of third party assistance to labour and management to aid them in resolving their differences through the bargaining process. Unfortunately, there are rare situations where bargaining fails and the government, as defender of the public interest and caretaker of the economy, must intervene to prevent irreparable damage. This is the situation we face today in the dispute involving the British Columbia Maritime Employers' Association and the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, Canadian area.

The current dispute, honourable senators, between the BCMEA and the ILWU centres around the negotiations for renewal of the collective agreement which expired on December 31, 1985. The agreement, covering some 2,250 regular longshoremen and 2,000 casual longshoremen, was the subject of direct bargaining between the parties from October 4 to December 2, 1985. Following the breakdown of direct negotiations between the parties, the union filed a notice of dispute and requested that the conciliation proceedings of the Canada Labour Code be waived. In view of the dismal record which characterizes labour negotiations between these parties, the Minister of Labour decided it would be inappropriate to waive conciliation efforts and thus appointed a conciliation officer from the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service of Labour Canada on December 20, 1985 to assist the parties in resolving their differences.

During the month of January 1986 the parties continued to meet in direct negotiations. Conciliation meetings between the conciliation officer and the parties began on February 3, 1986 and continued on various dates during the following two-month period before the parties again met in direct negotiations for two days in early April. Talks were subsequently adjourned to accommodate the union's annual convention and election of officers during the second week of April. The incumbent, Mr. Dave Lomas, was replaced by Mr. Don Garcia as president for the Canadian area of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union. Mr. Garcia immediately requested that the conciliation officer file his report and that no further third party assistance be provided.

Once again, in light of the difficulties which have typified past negotiations between these two parties, the minister determined that further conciliation assistance would be appropriate, and he appointed a conciliation commissioner. Mr. Dalton Larson was appointed on May 30, 1986, following which meetings with the two sides took place on five separate occasions during the month of June. Following the hearings, Mr. Larson advised the parties by letter dated July 18, 1986 that he would require written submissions from them in support of the positions that each had taken during the conciliation proceedings. The parties were requested to submit any data, statistics and historical background information which would provide the conciliation commissioner with additional insight into their respective positions on the various contract items in dispute. Following receipt of the parties' submissions, Commissioner Larson afforded each party an opportunity to rebut the arguments put forward by the other.

Following a comprehensive review of the parties' respective positions, Mr. Larson wrote and filed his final report with the Minister of Labour. The report of the conciliation commissioner was subsequently released to the parties on September 8, 1986, and further direct bargaining took place on September 25 and on October 3.

On October 6, 1986 the BCMEA instituted a lockout of the work force. In response to a telegram which the Minister of Labour sent them, seeking a resumption of grain shipments, the BCMEA agreed to lift the lockout for a 30-day period, during which time the parties were to continue in their efforts to resolve their differences.

Longshoring operations resumed on October 8 and the parties reconvened in negotiation on October 15. Following the failure of those negotiations, the minister appointed two mediators on October 29, and they immediately convened meetings aimed at resolving the impasse.

As I mentioned earlier, on November 14 the Minister of Labour personally met with the two bargaining committees and appealed to them to settle their differences through the negotiation process.

In order to provide honourable senators with some perspective on this dispute, it may be instructive if I recount briefly the findings of the conciliation commissioner who dealt with the dispute. In his report, Mr. Larson made recommendations dealing with all of the contentious issues, including wages, container handling, bulk terminal operations, pensions, hours of work, and automation protection. Conciliation Commissioner Larson recommended a three-year agreement effective January 1, 1986 to December 31, 1988, with a wage freeze in the first year, a 2 per cent increase on the base rate in the second year, and a 3 per cent increase on the base rate in the third year of the agreement.

By far the most contentious issue, and the one which the commissioner labelled "a singular impediment to the successful conclusion of a new collective agreement," is the container handling clause, article 26.05 of the collective agreement. This clause, which provides the union with jurisdiction over the stuffing and destuffing of consolidated cargo containers which are destined for, or come from, any point within the Vancouver local area, or the Prince Rupert port area, places the Port of Vancouver at a competitive disadvantage with major United States ports such as Seattle and Tacoma.

The BCMEA feels that the removal of the limitations represented by the container clause would increase sharply the amount of container traffic and thus the amount of skilled work available to the union. This view is shared by the Vancouver Port Authority, the Vancouver Board of Trade and a number of shipping lines.

From its point of view, the ILWU views the employers' claim with skepticism and is concerned that if the forecast of increased traffic predicted by the BCMEA is wrong, the union will have surrendered jurisdiction over a substantial part of its present work with little hope of winning it back.

Honourable senators, I think it would be worth while at this point to review briefly the situation pertaining to the container clause since its inclusion in the collective agreement in 1970. While the clause was negotiated into the collective agreement with the expectation that it would maximize work opportunities for longshoremen, it has actually proven to have the reverse effect. With the advent of the container handling clause in the collective agreement, shippers began moving their containers through Seattle and other west coast ports and then trucking them to Vancouver in order to avoid the effects of the clause. While the amount of container traffic to the Port of Vancouver has increased marginally over the past decade, it has lagged considerably behind the increase in the amount of Canadian container cargo handled by the ports of Seattle and Tacoma. Reliable sources have estimated that as many as 80,000 containers shipped through American west coast ports each year are destined for Canada.

The container clause has been the subject of a number of reports and studies by various interest groups. In 1982 a committee of two, one representing the employers and the other representing the union, was appointed to make recommendations concerning the container clause. The report of that committee, co-authored by the current ILWU Canadian area President, Mr. Garcia, recommended a one-year moratorium on the container clause, with a monitoring of the related effects on container traffic through the Port of Vancouver and employment opportunities for longshoremen in the Port of Vancouver. That recommendation was subsequently rejected by the union caucus. During 1985 a larger committee was appointed by the parties to review the container handling issue and to attempt to measure the amount of container work being done by longshoremen.

Meetings were held from time to time from March to October of 1985, and options explored regarding the form of employment safeguards which would be required to replace the current provisions. In his recommendations for resolving the current labour dispute between the parties, Mr. Larson recommended that the container clause be eliminated on condition that the BCMEA guarantee that the number of hours available to be worked on the containers in any year be fixed at 725,000. In the event that the hours fell below that number, the BCMEA would be required to pay any shortfall at straight-time rates to the trustees for the benefit of active members of the ILWU to compensate for actual work opportunities lost. The commissioner also suggested that the guarantee should continue indefinitely until the employer is able to convince the union that there is no longer a need for it.

In other areas the commissioner has recommended the extension of the mechanization and modernization supplementary pension agreement to all union members without restriction as to when they joined the union, an increase in the employer contributions to the welfare plan, and increased flexibility in the deployment of dock gantry crane drivers as part of the regular work force. Commissioner Larson recommended against the employers' demand for a comprehensive new system for bulk terminal operations and, instead, proposed a revision of work rules to allow for holding over a crew to the next shift to complete unloading procedures at overtime rates.

Honourable senators, the bill before us today, namely, the Maintenance of Ports Operations Bill, 1986, orders the immediate resumption of longshoring and related operations in the west coast ports. With the sole exception of matters relating to container handling, the longshoremen will return to work under the terms as set forth in the report of the conciliation commissioner, Dalton L. Larson. The bill provides that if the parties to the collective agreement are unable to agree to the interpretation or incorporation of any of the conciliation commissioner's recommendations regarding the collective agreement, a referee may be appointed to interpret the amendment for the purpose of incorporating it in the agreement and/or to determine the manner in which the amendment should be expressed in contractual language. Because of the critical importance of the container clause to both parties, an industrial inquiry commission will be appointed to make a final and binding determination, after conducting a comprehensive investigation of the issue.

One has only to look at the dismal record of labour relations between the employers and the union over the past 16 years to realize that the parties themselves must shoulder the bulk of the responsibility for the situation in which we find ourselves today. The record speaks for itself. With the exception of one two-year agreement signed during the period of the anti-inflation program in the mid-1970s and the one round of bargaining which saw wage re-opener negotiations for 1984 result in an extension to the contract through 1985, the parties have engaged in work stoppage action in every round of collective bargaining since 1970. On three previous occasions legislation has been required to end work stoppages.

Honourable senators, no collective agreement imposed by a third party will ever effectively substitute for a collective agreement which has been negotiated by the parties themselves. However, in this case the report of Conciliation Commissioner Dalton Larson strikes a reasonable compromise in the dispute between the BCMEA and the ILWU, and it is for this reason that his recommendations are being imposed as the basis of the new collective agreement between the parties. Nonetheless, in recognition of the fact that the container clause has been a matter of contention for at least a dozen years, a comprehensive study of the container issue will be undertaken, which will analyze every aspect of the problem, including the effects on the competitive position of the ports. Within a short time, the Minister of Labour will appoint an industrial inquiry commission to conduct a comprehensive investigation of the container issue, and its findings will constitute a binding resolution of the matter.

Honourable senators, failure to agree is no reason by itself for intervention by government or Parliament in a labour dispute. If we were faced with industrial action for which there were reasonable alternatives, or in which the parties only inflicted harm on one another, the obvious course would be to let the work stoppage continue until the two parties decided to end it.

However, that is not the nature of the industry in the present case. The west coast ports are crucial to the economy of this country. Their importance to the ability of western Canada's grain producers to get their crops to domestic and world markets is unquestionable.

A protracted work stoppage on the west coast, which further damages Canada's international reputation as a reliable exporter, cannot be tolerated. A final resolution of the container issue is imperative. The provisions of the Maintenance of Ports Operations Bill, 1986, addresses these two key issues.

In conclusion, honourable senators, let me summarize. This dispute has dragged on too long and the work stoppage is causing far too much harm to other sectors of the economy. The parties refuse to resolve their differences. Parliament, therefore, is required to act and to fulfill the responsibilities which the parties have abdicated. In order to ensure that the public interest is protected from the intransigence of the parties to a private dispute, I urge honourable senators to give speedy passage to the Maintenance of Ports Operations Bill, 1986.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to begin what will be a fairly brief intervention at this time by expressing my appreciation to the Deputy Leader of the Government for providing us several hours ago with the background information that he had in his possession at that time. I am sure he and other senators will understand that that was very useful. I must add that I am accepting that background information as fact, even though some of it is in the form of opinions. Obviously, we have not had time to check it with the opinions of other people who would have an interest in this case. As I say, I am not questioning it; I merely accept it because we have not had time to check it out thoroughly, notwithstanding the fact that I am aware that that is sometimes a dangerous procedure.

Honourable senators, we are dealing here with a lockout, which is somewhat different from a strike, although the consequences of shutting down operations are obviously the same in either case. I understand that in this case the reason that these two parties are unable to reach an agreement is that the container clause, which is the contentious issue between the parties, remains in effect. That clause is one that was put into the agreement between the parties some years ago and is operative until a new agreement is reached. Therefore, the provisions of the past agreement still apply. As I understand it, the union is apparently in favour of that position whereas the employers are not.

I agree with the Honourable Deputy Leader of the Government, Senator Doody, that this work stoppage is harmful to the grain producers in western Canada. However, it does not stop there. It is also detrimental to everyone else who is involved in the export trade through those ports. It becomes even more critical at this time because of the quality of the crop that was grown in western Canada this past year. The very difficult harvesting conditions reduced the quality substantially from what it would have been had the crop been harvested under better conditions. This circumstance has made the crop much more difficult to sell in the international market.

Knowing that, and also knowing that the international market is very difficult at this time because of competition, particularly from the EEC and the United States, it is extremely important that those ports be operated every day so that we can maximize the amount of grain getting to market.

From that brief summary you can take it that we agree that it was important to bring in this legislation quickly, which the Minister of Labour gave an undertaking to do last week, after his meeting on the west coast when he was unable to bring both parties together. We commend the government for that.

Having said that, I must point out that I think the bill is badly drafted. There are provisions in the bill that go beyond what Parliament has done in situations like this in the past. Some of them—and I will be brief—are precedent setting and, indeed, dangerous. They go much further than emergency legislation demands. We have been summoned to complete all stages of debate on this bill in one day. I am not objecting to that, but ordinarily, when we are asked to pass legislation such as this, it is to deal with an emergency situation and is to be effective for a short period of time, until further investigation, negotiation, bargaining, and so forth takes place so that an agreement can be reached. Emergency legislation normally does not extend as far into the future as this bill does. For example, this bill will impose a collective agreement which we have not yet seen and that could run until the end of December 1988—more than two years into the future.

Senator van Roggen: After the next general election.

Senator Olson: Yes. It also crossed my mind that that might have been the reason for having the legislation extend for such a period of time.

I see the deputy leader, who has attempted to give us all the reasons as to why this legislation has been brought in, is shaking his head in such a way as to indicate that he does not agree with that comment.

Senator Murray: The government's mandate runs to 1989.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: Yes, but four years is the norm, and that would mean the mandate ends in 1988.

In any event, I should like the Leader of the Government and the Deputy Leader of the Government to know that we recognize this and do not believe that emergency legislation should include elements of political expediency. That appears to be what the government had in mind when it put the dates in.

Senator Walker: What are you going to do now?

Senator Olson: I will point out some of the weaknesses in this legislation, which is the highest responsibility of the opposition in dealing with proposals put forth by the government.

Senator Walker: You will never change!

Senator Olson: There are more weaknesses, so you should save your comments until I have cited all of them.

Another problem is that there are some new features in this bill that we have not seen in emergency legislation before. I think they are undesirable and should not be included under the guise of emergency legislation. I think the worst relates to the clause dealing with punishment for offences. Clause 13 does, in fact, prohibit a person involved in a labour union from being employed in that field if a conviction is registered against that person. There is no equivalent prohibition on the other side.

Senator MacEachen: There has been an amendment.

Senator Olson: I am aware that an amendment has been made. I believe clause 13(3) was added during the debate in the other place, but I do not think that that quite answers the problem where you do not have an equal burden on each side. However, this punishment of five years is new. It used to be that punishment was in the form of fines, but prohibiting a person from being involved in a particular field for five years is new. I am not absolutely certain of that, but I think it is new.

Again, I think this change should be brought about through amendments to the Canada Labour Code and should not be brought into being through emergency legislation.

However, it is here, and I want to point out to the government that I think it is not the right way to introduce new precedent-setting provisions to the Canada Labour Code.

There are one or two other problems. There is a great deal of imprecision, if I may use that word, as to what is meant by the term "Industrial Inquiry Commission". I intended to refer to the Canada Labour Code under Part V to see if there is a clear definition of that term, but I did not have the time. If there is not, then we have a difficulty, because this bill, I believe, states—and I am just now having a quick look at it—that the terminology in the Canada Labour Code, Part V, should apply to the provisions of this bill. I do not object to that, but I want to make sure that there is the kind of definition that is required, especially for that Industrial Inquiry Commission, because there has been some discussion as to whether that commission consists of one person or a group of three or five, and whether or not there will be a requirement that consultations take place with the employers and with the labour unions before the Industrial Inquiry Commission is established. That, quite frankly, is not clear in this bill.

One other matter that has disturbed us is that there will be subsequent terms and conditions in the agreement that because of this legislation will have the force of law before we even know what they are. In other words, we are giving a blank cheque to a commission to come forward with an agreement, and this legislation has the effect of making that the law of this land, even before we have seen its terms. I am not sure that that is good legislation—that is, to give authority to someone to create terms and conditions which will have the force of this legislation in advance of our having seen them.

I see the leader is a little agitated about that, as if to say that that might have been the practice in the past, but I think on reflection he will see that it was not designed in that same manner. We would never give a blank endorsement of whatever might come and for the length of time involved in this agreement.

● (1750)

In conclusion, honourable senators, I think that the government and the Minister of Labour have not taken their own advice, because when the minister spoke on second reading of this bill he said:

It is only as a very last resort that governments should intervene in the collective bargaining process,

That is a fact; I am not arguing with that. But, then he goes on to say:

and such interventions should be minimal if we are to maintain respect for the law and the institutions of Parliament.

I think that is a good statement, but I think that the government has not kept the intervention in this emergency legislation minimal. Its duration is far too long—it applies to the end of 1988—and, indeed, it has brought in some precedent-setting provisions and labour-management relations that I think deserve more consideration than they can receive in an emergency debate where you pass all stages in one day, or, indeed, almost in one sitting.

So, honourable senators, there are some very serious weaknesses in this bill, and I hope that we recognize that when we pass it in the emergency situation that we are faced with now. I will stop there and hope that the minister will be present so that we can put our questions to him when we consider the bill in Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I, too, would like to touch on a few concerns—though I share some that have been expressed by Senator Olson. First, dealing with the negative aspects of the legislation, Senator Olson asked a question about the penalty section and where it came from. Yes, it is new—new in Canada, but not in the United States. It is a direct extract from the Landrum-Griffin labour legislation dealing with penalties in the United States, and it also included the unfair aspect of it where you only apply the penalties to the union side and not to the employers. Now, there is a mild amendment that has been made in the other place, and it appears to be evenhanded and to bring some balance, but it does not. On the union side, any officer of the union will be disqualified from acting for that union for five years if he is found to have committed an offence under the act. An employer in similar circumstances is disqualified from acting for the association, but would be free to represent or to act for any dock operator or any company doing business on the waterfront. So, really, there is no place in Canadian legislation for these kinds of penalties if they are not going to be applied fairly. That is the first concern I have.

My second concern is the imposition of—and this is a point Senator Olson raised—the term of the contract for what is ultimately a three-year period. It is a very dangerous practice, I believe, for legislation to impose a contract under those terms.

I think, perhaps, I should say at the outset that it would be appropriate if I were to reveal what might appear to be conflict of interest on the legislation, although I think it is more imaginary than real, because some might say that the organization that I represent in real life—which is a trucking union, the Teamsters Union—can be the beneficiary of the continuation of the lockout. In the last few days when the lockout occurred and one of the ships carrying automobiles had to be re-routed to the United States, it took 90 trucks to haul those cars back to the Port of Vancouver, or the city of Vancouver. They would normally have been off-loaded there, but, because they were not, 90 members of my organization achieved additional job opportunities as a result. But having revealed that apparent conflict of interest, I should point out that that temporary gain of jobs would be offset so desperately by the continuation of this dispute that it is hardly worth mentioning. It should be pointed out that what we are talking about here is legislation ending an employer lockout, an employer strike; that is why it seems even more unfair that we have such penalties directed at the union, who are locked out not by their choice but because it is imposed on them by the employers. So, I think it shows a somewhat detectable bias on the part of the government that there are more severe penalties for the union when the legislation is necessitated by an employer lockout.

The key issue appears to be the container clause—and much has been made of that—and it obviously is a very real issue between the parties, because the longshoremen have tried successfully for 16 years to maintain that clause. But it is an oversimplification to suggest that that is the real cause of the dispute, because if we were able to wash the clause away tomorrow and double the container traffic, the port would grind to a halt—not because of a strike or a lockout but because of its inability to deal with the traffic. Much has been made in the press, and so on, about the Port of Seattle and how they are taking away a lot of the business from the Port of Vancouver. That is true, but how are they able to do it? Well, Seattle has 31 container cranes; in the Port of Vancouver, this modern port, we have five. So, if we doubled the container traffic, we could not handle it. A lot of the responsibility for the problem rests in the hands of this government and previous governments. Sometimes it is the best thing that happens to have a dispute like this come to Parliament, because then Ottawa becomes aware and the government becomes aware of the very serious problem we have in Vancouver and the desperate need for a crash program of facilities to compete with Seattle, Long Beach, and all of the other west coast ports, which we are unable to do because we do not have the facilities. I have talked with operators in Vancouver, trucking operators, port operators, who have bold, innovative, imaginative plans to expand the ports and to expand the traffic and capture this business. What we desperately need, notwithstanding this legislation, is a committee that involves the City of Vancouver, the Port of Vancouver, the longshoremen, the trucking operators, the federal government, Ports Canada, all of the players who are involved—and a crash program to make this a truly modern port with all of the facilities needed to recapture this business and to create many hundreds more jobs. As you will have noticed from the honourable deputy leader's remarks, there was a willingness on the part of some of the officers of the longshoremen's union to set the container clause aside. That element of goodwill should have been seized upon to move in and create all of the necessary facilities and all of the necessary equipment which would have resulted in more and more jobs. I suspect that this would have made the container clause a not very important issue because there would have been sufficient additional traffic, additional jobs, and additional job security that the container clause could have been the subject of very easy negotiation between the parties. But in the absence of all of that, who can blame the longshoremen for digging their heels in and saying, "No; unless we are satisfied that something will be done to create job security and guarantee more jobs, why should we simply give it up?" While I am not minimizing the impact of the container clause, it only represents 12 per cent to 15 per cent of the traffic in that port. So, let us not take it—as we weigh the container clause or impose an arbitrary settlement—that that is the end of the issue: It is not quite that simple.

What I am saying, in conclusion, is that what we require is a crash program in which all the people involved would come together to develop that port the way it should be so that we can compete, and by that action I think we would go a long way towards solving the problem that we are facing here today. It seems that we face this problem every four years—the last couple of times it was to legislate the end to a strike; this time it is to legislate the end to a lockout. We could avoid that four years down the road, or eight years down the road, if we would simply come together and work it out.

Having said all that, I turn to the positive aspect. While I think that the longshoremen have a legal right to take the position they are taking, and while I recognize that the employers have a legal right to take the position they are taking in locking out the longshoremen, I think that the rights of the City of Vancouver, the Province of British Columbia, and the country as a whole outweigh their individual rights and that we have no alternative but to pass this legislation. I feel it would be a hollow piece of legislation if we do not take some positive steps to avoid the problem in the future.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to Committee of the Whole, and that the Senate do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole for that purpose.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., that this bill be now referred to Committee of the Whole.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Senator Rhéal Bélisle in the Chair.

Pursuant to rule 18 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable Pierre H. Cadieux, P.C., Minister of Labour, was escorted to a seat in the Senate Chamber.

[Translation]

Senator Murray: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to welcome to the Senate, for the first time, my colleague, the Honourable Minister of Labour, Mr. Pierre Cadieux. Mr. Cadieux is a lawyer from Quebec and has been the Member for the riding of Vaudreuil since September 1984 and a member of the cabinet since last June.

[English]

I would simply tell my colleague that he will find he is in good and knowledgeable company in this chamber to deal with the bill having to do with labour matters. The Leader of the Opposition in this place, Senator MacEachen, held the portfolio that M. Cadieux now holds almost a quarter of century ago.

Senator Buckwold: You can still learn from him.

Senator Murray: He, too, had occasion to bring in legislation settling labour disputes from time to time.

Another senator who was with us this afternoon, Senator Croll, was Minister of Labour of the province of Ontario before you were born.

I am sure Mr. Cadieux will not let that information intimidate him. As he will have noticed earlier this evening, I am sure he will find that, by and large, senators are constructive, reasonable and of very good humour.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the minister has an opening statement to make but, of course, he is ready to respond to the questions of honourable senators as we go through the bill clause by clause.

[Translation]

The Chairman: Honourable senators, Mr. Cadieux, speaking on behalf of the government, do you wish to make a statement before we start consideration of this bill in Committee of the Whole?

Hon. Pierre Cadieux (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

Senator Olson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with the Leader of the Government in the Senate in welcoming the Minister of Labour here to the Senate for the first time. I hope we will be able to find some amicable solutions to some of the matters in this bill that bother us and which were raised just a few minutes ago during the debate on second reading.

It may be that at the outset you would like to deal with only two of those matters. One relates to what we believe to be new departures in legislation, particularly the amount of time involved. As we said, it looks as though we could have a collective agreement under this bill which could run to the end of 1988, and that seems to be a long period in dealing with emergency legislation and is, perhaps, unprecedented in emergency legislation.

The second matter concerns a new provision in the bill to do with penalties. In the last few minutes I have been advised by Senator Lawson that these penalties are not new in the United States but they are, in fact, new in Canada, in spite of the amendment that was moved and accepted in the other place. As Senator Lawson has pointed out, we do not believe that the burden of these penalties applies equally on both sides to the dispute at the moment.

Perhaps the minister could deal with those matters and then we could ask some questions as we move through the clause-by-clause study of the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux: Thank you very much, honourable senators. I welcome this opportunity to be here today to answer your questions.

As you probably know, I have had to answer similar questions in the other place.

[English]

Those concerns are serious enough that I understand your wanting to question some of the issues that have already been raised in the other place.

With respect to the duration of the agreement and the fact that it might last until 1988, I do not think we are facing an unprecedented situation, because other conciliation reports have been the subject of legislation before and they have been passed for the duration of the collective agreement that was provided for in those reports. I would refer you to a situation in 1974 where the government legislated the recommendations of Commissioner Perry, the conciliation commissioner in the west coast grain handlers' dispute. In 1975 the government legislated the recommendations of the conciliation commissioner in the dispute involving the St. Lawrence River ports, Montreal, Quebec and Trois-Rivières. Therefore, we are not hearing something new with respect to collective agreements being imposed through recommendations.

If you read the bill carefully, which I am sure you have already done, you will notice that the parties, notwithstanding the fact of the imposition of the present recommendations, have every opportunity to return to the table and to reach whatever agreements they feel are reasonable. Obviously, any agreement that they may reach will be the law as between the parties.

● (1810)

With respect to the legislation of penalties, Senator Lawson mentioned that it is unknown in Canada. With great respect, that is not so. The Province of Quebec was legislating such penalties as recently as last summer in the construction dispute there. Of course, that government legislated some other very tough dispositions last week, but that situation was different because they were dealing then with an illegal strike. I repeat, however, that in the construction dispute of last summer, the Province of Quebec did impose such penalties. This practice is not therefore related directly to the American provisions to which the senator referred.

With respect to the amendment that was proposed in the other place, that was an amendment initiated by the government.

Senator Olson: Are you speaking of the amendment to clause 13?

Mr. Cadieux: Yes, senator, it is actually the amendment to subclause 13(3). We did recognize at the time of the debate that there was an unfair, or unequal disposition, if you like, in the bill that seemed only to address the union. The government felt that a similar disposition ought to be introduced in the bill to deal with the employers. The amendment was accordingly proposed by myself, as a matter of fact, and was adopted.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, if I may, I should like to extend a welcome to the minister and to express my enjoyment at meeting yet another Minister of Labour. We always look forward to that. I also welcome his very distinguished colleague, who has had great success in settling industrial disputes.

My question really turns upon procedure, Mr. Minister. The Honourable Deputy Leader of the Government in this chamber delineated the facts surrounding this very dismal record between the BCMEA and the ILWU. If I recall correctly, he said that since 1970 only two agreements had been negotiated between the parties and that on three occasions legislative action was required. He also delineated all of the steps taken in the mediation, including your own intervention.

In light of the importance of the free flow of traffic and the rhythm that is so essential to transportation, why was this bill not passed last week so as to come into force on proclamation? In that way there would have been no work stoppage and, likely, no diversion of ships, and so on.

Mr. Cadieux: Senator, as was mentioned earlier, I am a fairly new minister to begin with, and a brand new minister of labour. Of course, this may be my own ignorance, but I do not know of any case where there was legislation ordering people back to work if they were not off work. Last week there was no lockout.

Senator Sinclair: If I understood the press correctly, you said to the parties that either they agreed or legislation would be introduced to force them back to work. That being so, and to prevent a break in the rhythm—the very important rhythm—of transportation through the port, this bill could have been passed last week, after which it could have been proclaimed, and there would have been no work stoppage at all. Am I wrong in my understanding?

Mr. Cadieux: Senator, on Friday morning I told the parties that they ought to agree and indicated to them that if they failed to come to a negotiated agreement, which I encouraged, and if there were disruption in the operation of the port, I would introduce legislation. The parties subsequently met, I am told, for approximately 90 minutes. By Friday afternoon they were unable to come to a negotiated agreement, indicated that to the press, and the lockout was effective at 1 a.m. on Saturday.

I immediately looked into my final option, which was to introduce legislation. It was prepared and was introduced at the first possible moment.

Senator Sinclair: My point, Mr. Minister, if I may, is this: Given this very unusual circumstance, given this history of the inability of these parties to engage in collective bargaining with any measure of success, given the slim chance of their getting together on such a contentious issue as the de-stuffing and stuffing of a container—which has caused problems in every port throughout the world—would it not have been open to you, and more effective, to say to the parties that you had a bill which had been passed; and they should either agree or it would come into force on proclamation the moment a strike was called or a lockout imposed?

Mr. Cadieux: Again, senator, I am relatively new to this business, but I do believe in the collective bargaining process. Until such collective bargaining is impossible, I do not think that governments should intervene. I met with the parties and I told them what I would do, that I would do it with regret, but that I would do it because it is my responsibility as Minister of Labour to ensure that other parties do not suffer from their incapacity to come to a negotiated settlement after trying to do so for 16 years. I believe, senator, that the government acted fairly in the circumstances at the first appropriate moment.

Senator Lawson: Honourable senators, I have only a couple of questions that I will direct to the minister. I add my voice to those welcoming him. I also welcome an old friend, Bill Kelly, who has a distinguished career with the Department of Labour.

I share the minister's view that the dispute between the parties was unsolvable. I do not quarrel with the position he has taken—a determined position to give them an option to resolve their difficulties. Failing that resolution, he was forced to act. I do not quarrel with that. I think that the longshoremen are a determined, strong, militant organization and that if they were locked out for two weeks, two months or, perhaps, six months, they would not change their position on the container clause. I do not, therefore, take issue with the minister's action.

I thank the minister for his reference to the Quebec legislation; I was not aware of it. But I would ask whether their legislation is as unfair as this is. Subclause 13(2) reads:

(2) No officer or representative of a union who is convicted of an offence under this Act that was committed while the officer or representative was acting in that capacity shall be employed in any capacity by, or act as an officer or representative of, the union at any time during the five years immediately after the date of the conviction.

It is very clear that any such union representative could not work on the waterfront, the dock, or be in any way associated with the longshoremen's organization. That is very clear as I read it. If, however, we go to the amendment that has now been brought in, we will see that it talks about members of the employers' association. Subclause 13(3) reads:

(3) No officer or representative of a member of the employers association, including any corporation listed in Schedule I, who is convicted of an offence under this Act shall be employed in any capacity by, or act as an officer or representative of, the employers association . . .

What, in this legislation, would prevent that officer of an association, on the day following his conviction, from being an employee of any one of the 50 companies on the scheduled list and continuing to work in his capacity or in some capacity on the waterfront? What is to prevent him from doing that under this legislation?

Mr. Cadieux: First, senator, with respect to subclause 13(2), which deals with the union, the prohibition applies to the individual acting as an officer of the union and not, obviously, to the longshoremen or those working in any other capacity on the waterfront. Subclause 13(3) applies to the employer officer in that he would not be able to work in his capacity as an officer of the association of the employers. In that sense, then, it is an equal situation.

Senator Lawson: Equal—one horse, one rabbit! I think it is most unfair. The representative of the employers' association could still work in a managerial capacity within any one of the 50 companies. The union member, on the other hand, would have a limited opportunity with just the local unions. That is the weakness in this legislation. It seems that it is being applied in a totally unfair manner.

Am I to understand that clause 12, which deals with the alteration of the agreement, means that the parties are free to negotiate any other change except the reduction of the term, that it must extend to the end of 1988? My question really is: Could the parties agree, by consent of the parties, to make it a one-year contract, and then go back to the negotiations; or are they allowed under this legislation to make modifications, but not allowed to change the term; that it must run the full three years until 1988?

● (1820)

Mr. Cadieux: My interpretation of the bill is that the parties could make any alteration which they would agree to make.

Senator MacEachen: Including the expiry date?

Mr. Cadieux: If I may refer you to clause 5, it says:

The term of the collective agreement to which this Act applies is extended to include the period beginning on January 1, 1986 and ending on the day on which a new collective agreement entered into between the parties thereto in amendment or revision thereof comes into effect, or on December 31, 1988, whichever is the earlier.

Senator Lawson: But clause 12 says:

Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to limit or restrict the rights of the parties to the collective agreement to which this Act applies to agree to vary or amend any of the provisions of the agreement as amended pursuant to this Act, other than a provision relating to the term of the agreement, and to give effect thereto.

That appears to be in conflict with clause 5.

Mr. Cadieux: No, senator, it is not.

Senator van Roggen: Mr. Minister, I join my confrères in welcoming you here this evening. I was going to deal with the amendment, but Senator Lawson has already done so. I would simply like to reinforce the complaint he makes. If we refer to the penalty clauses of this bill, there is in 13(1)(a), (b) and (c) a parallel on both sides, which could be fairly imposed by a court because there is leeway regarding the fines. When we come to subclause (2) as the bill was originally drafted, we find there is a very serious additional penalty imposed on individual union officers in that for five years they cannot act further in that capacity. They are fired from their jobs and they are relegated to driving a truck on the docks or to driving a taxi cab.

That is a very serious penalty against individuals, and over and above the extensive fines provided for, which are quite adequate to break the union if a judge saw fit to do so. What is now proposed to parallel this on the side of the companies? Merely a meaningless amendment. A company officer who commits a similar offence may pay the fine, as would a union man, but does he lose his job? No. The company simply says that his confrère on the other side of the office is appointed in his place to act on the employers' council. That is all that happens. Nothing else happens. So, that man remains in his job, his pay cheque remains intact, and he has no penalty imposed on him whatsoever, except that the company is put to the inconvenience of saying that Vice President B instead of Vice President A becomes the company's representative in the employers' association. That is the only penalty, and it is a meaningless penalty. It is not a penalty at all. I would suggest that it would have been better not to have brought in that amendment. It highlights the terrible imbalance in the penalties as between the employees and their companies and the union.

Having said that, it is important that the record should show that coming from British Columbia I applaud the need for this legislation and the necessity of keeping our ports operating. I would not, therefore, offer an amendment. However, I wish the record to show that I consider the penalty provisions not to be parallel when considered in addition to the provision concerning fines and that I consider this to be a meaningless amendment.

I come now to the question of the make-up of the commission. The bill contains a provision that a commission shall be appointed. Can the minister tell us whether he contemplates the commission comprising one or more members, and whether he has given any thought to how the commission will be appointed? Do you intend to seek suggestions from the unions and employers regarding the members of the commission, if there is more than one? Do you anticipate proceeding as in a typical arbitration, where the parties could each suggest one commissioner and those two commissioners, in agreement with yourself as minister, could appoint a third? I consider it important that Parliament, which is being asked to legislate what might be called a "pig-in-a-poke" piece of legislation, should have the benefit of your thinking at the moment regarding the make-up of the commission—the decision on which will be statutorily imposed by this statute in advance.

I might say parenthetically, concerning your reference a few moments ago to other occasions where reports of commissions had been enshrined in legislation, that those reports at that time were already produced and parliamentarians had them before them; but today Parliament is being told: "You pass legislation where you put in law, by statute, a report, whatever it might say, by a commission which has not yet been appointed." That, I believe, is extremely unusual legislation, and we should not be asked to do that without at least having the benefit of your thoughts, as minister, on how the commission will be appointed.

Mr. Cadieux: With respect to the appointment of a commission that will render a report that will be binding on the parties, that, senator, is a fact with this legislation, and I humbly suggest that it may involve the same procedure that is followed in connection with arbitrators, namely, that when we appoint arbitrators and say that their report will be binding on the parties, we do not know what that report will contain, anyway.

With respect to the commission itself, most probably it will be a one-person commission. With regard to the issue of the container clause, notwithstanding some of the arguments that have been made today and which I have heard also in the other place—that it may not be the only important issue, that there may be other points which have to be looked into with regard to the operation of the port, and the difficulty which has occasioned the disruption of the port and the inability of the parties to agree for the past 16 years—I considered that instead of legislating immediately on keeping or removing the clause, it would be appropriate to appoint a third party commission to look into it once and for all and to render a decision which would be binding on the parties. That is exactly what we are doing; and I am sure that the person appointed to head the commission will be the best person in the country to do so.

Senator van Roggen: I have one further question on a separate point. The estimates of the additional container business that might be attracted back to Vancouver over a period of time from Seattle and elsewhere has run as high as 80,000 containers per year. The Port of Vancouver, having been operated for many years by civil servants in Ottawa, some of whom had never seen salt water, for many years has suffered very badly in comparison with port development elsewhere. The previous government went to some lengths, under the new Ports Act, to try to give more authority to the ports. I would not like to say that the situation has been reversed, but under the present government there has been a tendency to drift away from that, which I regret but which I will not go into in any detail right now.

My question to you is this: Have you had or do you intend to have discussions with the Minister of Transport and your other confrères on the question of starting now, before the report of the commission comes down, to enhance the Port of Vancouver, to put in new container cranes to get ready for these additional containers which cannot be utilized if there are not the facilities there to handle them? As Senator Lawson has just pointed out, there are only five container cranes in Vancouver whereas there are 30 in Seattle. Admittedly, Seattle does more container business than we do because of trade with Hawaii, and many of our commodities are not suitable for containers. However, we need more facilities than we have now, and keeping in mind that the lead time to order, build and install container cranes is probably two years at a minimum, I would hope that the government will move forward on that front simultaneously with this legislation.

Mr. Cadieux: I agree with something that was said earlier by an honourable senator. Unfortunately, I forget who it was, but I believe that it was Senator Lawson. That is that if there is one good side to this back-to-work legislation, it is that it focuses Ottawa's attention on what is happening in the B.C. ports and perhaps on the difficulties the ports are facing, notwithstanding the container issue. I agree that in order to be competitive, the ports may require a face lift, particularly to compete with the facilities that are found in Seattle, Tacoma and other ports on the west coast of the United States. As the honourable senator is aware, I do not have the jurisdiction to make recommendations that go beyond my portfolio. However, the commission that is to be appointed will have sufficiently broad terms of reference to look into the situation of the ports in general, as well as the specific mandate to look at the container issue. I expect that it will be able to speak on such issues as competitiveness and others. Certainly, when I get the report, I shall make the necessary recommendations to my colleagues. I intend to hold discussions with the port authorities in the near future to follow up on what I have learned during this debate and, perhaps, to make some suggestions as a concerned Canadian to the effect that they should begin to look into these facilities.

Senator van Roggen: With respect, my point was that consideration of and decisions on this matter should be made before the the commission hands down its report.

Senator Lawson: On the broad terms of reference the commission of inquiry will have, will they include the right of other organizations who may be directly affected by the recommendations of the commission to make submissions? I am sure that Mr. Kelly understands what I am referring to. Depending on what decision the commissioner imposes, whether it is the one with regard to mileage limits or any other one, it will affect other trades and other organizations. Will those trades and organizations have the right to protect themselves from such a decision by having the right to make representations?

Mr. Cadieux: Of course, the commission will have terms of reference and the commissioner will adopt his own procedure within those terms of reference. I would be very surprised if any commissioner refused valid submissions from any party with respect to such an issue.

Senator van Roggen: Mr. Minister, a moment ago you made the point, in answer to my question about the general development of the Port of Vancouver through additional containers and so forth, that the commission or commissioner, as we now know that it will be a single man or woman, will not only be looking at the container provision but can make recommendations relative to the broader development of the Port of Vancouver. I would criticize the breadth of the scope of the commission. In any event, as I read subclause 7(1), it says:

On the coming into force of this Act, the Minister shall refer the matter of the container provisions set out in article 26.05 of the collective agreement to which this Act applies and such other matters related to that provision as the Minister deems appropriate to an industrial inquiry commission appointed by the Minister for a final and binding determination of those matters by the commission.

I suggest to you, Mr. Minister, that according to that wording the commissioner will be confined strictly to the container clause and nothing else, or I cannot read English.

Mr. Cadieux: I accept your argument, but, with respect, I do not agree. I think that the mandate of the commissioner is very clear. The commissioner will be given some terms of reference to deal with the specific mandate of reporting on the container clause, which will be binding on the parties to this particular dispute or to this particular collective agreement. Notwithstanding that mandate, the terms of reference will be broad enough for the commissioner to make the right decision as to whether or not the container clause should stay or should be removed. Therefore, I think that the commissioner has to look at the general situation of the ports in British Columbia and of the ports in the western United States in order to come to a final decision as to whether or not the container clause is good or bad and whether or not it should stay. I am sure that the commissioner will include in the report some recommendations as to the infrastructure and the ancillary points involved in determining whether or not that particular clause should change, remain or be cancelled.

Senator van Roggen: I suppose that there is no point in belabouring this point. That is not what the clause says and I suggest that you, Mr. Minister, will be ultra vires of this legislation if you refer matters other than the container provision to the commissioner. The commissioner in considering the question of the container clause may take broad evidence to arrive at his conclusion, but his mandate, if he, indeed, is obeying the statute—which, I trust, he will do—will be to bring down a recommendation relative to the container clause, and nothing else.

Mr. Cadieux: With all due respect, I agree with the honourable senator in the sense that there will be a specific binding recommendation on the container clause. However, the commissioner will be able to study all other related matters—and that is as I understand the legislation—relating to the container clause and thereby will be free to make some recommendations.

Senator van Roggen: Anybody can make a recommendation or have an opinion, but that is not part of the statute.

Senator Lawson: I prefer the minister's comment with regard to the "broad interpretation." That is the only way to conduct this commission successfully. If that is what is to be done, may I say on behalf of those who are directly involved and whom I mentioned earlier—trucking operators, employers and others—that there is a wealth of goodwill, and these people are willing and anxious to sit down with the commissioner to attempt to find a long-term solution to the problem and would welcome an opportunity to put forward constructive suggestions.

Mr. Cadieux: After 16 years, I welcome such a proposal.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-24, an Act to provide for the Maintenance of Ports Operations.

Shall the title be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall consideration of clause 1, the short title of the bill, be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Senator Olson: I have one short question on the interpretation of clause 2(2), which reads:

Unless otherwise provided, words and expressions used in this Act have the same meaning as in Part V of the Canada Labour Code.

More specifically, that clause refers to the definitions contained in the Canada Labour Code. That specifically means that the definitions contained in the Canada Labour Code will have the same meaning as the definitions contained in this bill. In my speech I raised this matter of the industrial inquiry commission. Can the minister tell me whether that inquiry commission is defined differently in the Canada Labour Code from the way it is defined in this proposed legislation and, if so, which definition will prevail?

● (1840)

Mr. Cadieux: Mr. Chairman, I refer the honourable senator to paragraph 7 which deals specifically with the industrial inquiry commission. The honourable senator will note that in subparagraph (5), the bill says:

The industrial inquiry commission has and may exercise all the powers of a person appointed as a commissioner under Part I of the Inquiries Act.

The reason for this specific subparagraph (2) to which you have already referred is that in the Canada Labour Code there is a specific delay to report. The provision under this bill is different. That is why we have included that particular subclause. In other words, unless otherwise provided here, the Canada Labour Code will apply.

Senator Olson: I take it, then, from your answer that in your opinion there is no ambiguity in this?

Mr. Cadieux: No.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I want to make a number of general observations about the impact of clause 7. As the deputy leader has pointed out, this bill provides for the suspension of collective bargaining rights which are provided for under law. What the government is doing is asking Parliament to suspend those rights. That, in itself, is a major request—an extraordinary request—and is seldom invoked, except when the public interest is involved and affected. Certainly, it has been done on occasions in the past, and here again Parliament is being asked to waive collective bargaining rights in order to protect the public interest.

In addition to that, Parliament is being asked to give the force of law to the conclusions of the conciliation inquiry. Clause 6 tells us that the recommendations contained in the conciliation report will become part of the contractual language of the collective agreement. Therefore, Parliament knows what is in that conciliation board report and is being asked to legislate it.

In the case of the report of the commission of inquiry, the situation is somewhat different. Parliament is being asked to approve the appointment of an industrial inquiry. Presumably the minister can do it on his own under the Inquiries Act, but in this case Parliament is being asked to do it. The minister will then refer to that industrial inquiry commission the container provision.

It is true that at least on one occasion that I can put my hand on in the past the government of the day, having appointed an arbitrator, came to Parliament and asked Parliament to legislate at that moment the future findings of the arbitrator. I have always found that to be, in a sense, an extraordinary request which can only be justified by the serious injury to the public interest which would occur in its absence.

In this case the inquiry commission will make certain pronouncements on the container provision. Subsequent to those pronouncements, the conclusions or the pronouncements will become part of the collective agreement. We do not know what those provisions will be. That will be determined by the commission of inquiry. When the commissioner of that inquiry makes up his or her mind, Parliament will not be asked to approve at all. I think it has always been an extraordinary request to make of the House of Commons and of the Senate to legislate provisions of a collective agreement which are, at that moment, unknown to any legislator. I think it is a very extraordinary request, and I underline it simply because it is extraordinary; not because it is without precedent.

Now that we are dealing with clause 7, I want to draw to the attention of honourable senators what I thought was a clear conclusion, or a clear determination, by the minister as to what was meant by the matter of the container provision. The section says:

... the Minister shall refer the matter of the container provision set out in article 26.05 of the collective agreement to which this Act applies and such other matters related to that provision as the Minister deems appropriate to an industrial inquiry commission appointed by the Minister for a final and binding determination of those matters by the commission.

The container provision is clear cut, but the scope of the commission is expanded by the addition of the phrase:

... and such other matters related to that provision as the Minister deems appropriate ...

That is further reinforced by the concluding phrase:

... of those matters by the commission.

[Senator MacEachen.]

The minister, then, will refer the container provision and such other matters as he deems appropriate that are related to the container provision. The minister then used the expression:

The commission will study the general situation and will study all related matters.

Surely, honourable senators, the question of job security is a related matter. The minister acknowledges that. I want to find out from the minister why he did not accept the amendment put forth in the other place when the question of job security was explicitly proposed as one of the related matters. Did he think that it was unnecessary to accept the amendment?

There were additional matters in a second amendment that was put forth in the other place that expanded the consideration beyond job security to the consideration of the development of the port, which is a related matter, to rail facilities and to the improvement of the competitive position of the port. I understand that an amendment was so proposed, but that it was turned down, as was the amendment dealing with job security.

I want to find out from the minister whether these "related matters" included job security, development of the port, rail facilities and improvement of the competitive position of the port, and, if they did, why he did not accept the amendment. Was it because he thought it was unnecessary and did not want to be limited by the inclusion or by making particular reference to three matters when perhaps the minister wanted to have seven or eight related matters referred to the industrial commission of inquiry?

Before I sit down, I must refer to the comment made by the Leader of the Government that I, at one time, was Minister of Labour. I had almost forgotten, but, now that I have been reminded, I, indeed, was Minister of Labour. I must say that the present minister made it at a slightly younger age than I did, and he certainly made the Senate more quickly than I did.

Mr. Cadieux: I hope the fact that I made it earlier than you did will not be held against me, senator.

With respect to the question of precedent, I would like to put on the record that in 1976, in a dispute involving the Port of Halifax—which was a lock-out, by the way—the government resolved the dispute through binding arbitration by an industrial inquiry commission. At that time I understand it was Judge Nathan Green who was appointed. So, obviously, this is not an unprecedented event, as you have mentioned.

With respect to the amendments that were proposed in the other place, the first amendment was effectively referring to more elements than job security. The principal reason that particular amendment was not accepted was that it referred to matters that go beyond my own jurisdiction. If I recall correctly—and I do not have the text before me—there was a suggestion that there should be some binding recommendations on the railway facilities in the Port of Vancouver. I do not think as Minister of Labour I have the jurisdiction or the authority to bind the Government of Canada with respect to that particular issue.

When that amendment was defeated, effectively another amendment was presented with respect to job security. That was also defeated, and the general reason was that, as I indicated in the other place and as I am indicating to this place now, job security will definitely be part of the terms of reference the commission will have to handle.

Senator MacEachen: I thank the minister for that clarification—that is that in his mind the related matters include job security.

Just for greater clarification, the broader amendment referred to the development of the port, rail facilities and the improvement of the competitive position of the port. I gather that while the minister earlier used the expression “general situation,” he did not intend it to include the development of the port, the rail facilities or the improvement of the competitive position of the port.

Mr. Cadieux: The specific mandate of the commission, as I have indicated earlier, in order to report in a binding way will be on the container clause. In order for this commission or commissioner to determine what ought to be the binding recommendation on the container clause, as provided in article 26.05 of the collective agreement, the terms of reference will permit the commission or commissioner to look into, as you have said, the port operations in general, the competitiveness and other related issues. I think a reasonable commissioner, who wants to bring down a binding resolution of the situation that has been in existence for 16 years, will consider that.

Senator MacEachen: I will not pursue this beyond one more question, but, presumably, whatever the commissioner brings down will have to be relevant to the collective agreement and, therefore, the commissioner will impose or write certain specific terms of the collective agreement. I can readily see that the development of the port directly, or rail facilities directly, would not be part of the terms of the agreement, but I do suggest that job security, and provisions for job security, could be the subject of his inquiry and, indeed, he could, in making whatever recommendations he wishes about the container provision, provide for certain aspects of job security which, presumably, the longshoremen have been concerned about. That is all I want to say.

Mr. Cadieux: On that point, senator, I believe that if one looks at the Larson Report, one will see that in his recommendation, which has not been imposed on the parties, he suggests that the container clause be done away with, but that 725,000 hours be guaranteed to the employees. That is a job security issue, and the terms of reference will definitely permit the commissioner to make similar recommendations if he so decides.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I wonder if the minister would deal with two points: I noticed that in the discussion that has taken place he has relied on the fact that there is or there are one or more precedents. These precedents may be good; these precedents may be bad.

Is there some other reason, setting aside the question of precedents, why the government has chosen to proceed in this way so that the report of the industrial inquiry commission appointed by the minister will make a determination which will be final and binding? Does the minister feel, quite aside from the precedents—which may be bad—that this is good legislative procedure?

The second question relates to the whole question of delegation by Parliament of its legislative authority. We know that this happens again and again. Parliament delegates authority to ministers and committees of the council to make orders and regulations, but in those cases Parliament is making the delegation to a minister or to a group of ministers who are under immediate responsibility to Parliament, particularly the House of Commons, and the regulation could very well be revoked under the pressure of reason or other considerations. Here we are being asked to make a delegation to a commissioner whose report will be final and binding. In other words, this is an extraordinary conferral of parliamentary authority. Is this not correct? How does the minister justify this kind of delegation of Parliament's legislative authority?

Mr. Cadieux: First of all, senator, on your first point as to whether or not this is the appropriate procedure or the appropriate method to solve this particular issue, this issue—as I have mentioned before, and as has been mentioned before in this distinguished Senate—has been “kicked around,” if I may use that expression, for the past 16 years. The parties involved in this particular dispute have never been able to agree on this particular issue—not because they have not tried. I believe it was referred to in an earlier speech, and it was referred to in my speech in the other place, namely, that even in 1982—if my memory serves me right—there was a two-person committee that was struck in order to look at the container clause—a member from the employers and a member from the union. The union member at that time was Mr. Garcia, who today is the leader of the ILWU. That two-person committee came down with the suggestion that the container clause should be suspended for one year, and when it was presented to the union caucus it was rejected. So, we were back to square one once again. I think that after 16 years somebody had to make a decision to bring this to a final conclusion, and that is what I have done with this particular mechanism, which I feel in the present circumstances is the appropriate mechanism.

With respect to the delegation of authority, notwithstanding the fact that I do not necessarily like to act simply because it was done before—I particularly like to innovate myself—but, considering that in arbitration that is exactly what we do, I do not think that this is a precedent, and I think it is the appropriate thing to do this time.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, shall clause 8 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, I don't think we called clause 7. Did we?

Senator MacEachen: That is right.

Senator Olson: No.

Senator Doody: No, I am afraid we did not. We called it, it was debated, and then we moved on to clause 8; we never did carry clause 7.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 12 carry?

Senator Olson: Mr. Chairman, I have been trying to reconcile what clause 12 states with what the minister explained with respect to clause 5 a few minutes ago, because clause 12, as I understand it, states that:

Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to limit or restrict the rights of the parties to the collective agreement to which this Act applies to . . . vary or amend any of the provisions of the agreement . . . other than a provision relating to the term of the agreement, and to give effect thereto.

It seems to me that that specifically states that there can be no adjustment of the term, and yet in clause 5 I got the impression that the minister was trying to make the argument that that provides that the term could be any time that is agreed on to have it come into effect, or December 31, 1988, whichever is earlier. Could he explain what the difference is? Is this after the agreement is made, or is there that much latitude left?

Mr. Cadieux: My understanding, senator—and you were right when you stated what I mentioned earlier—is the following: According to clause 5, the term of the present collective agreement is extended until December 31, 1988. Should the parties agree on a term, whether it be because of this particular legislation or because they decide to sit down at the table and negotiate a new collective agreement, they could obviously make it for whatever term they so chose.

Senator Olson: Short of December 1988.

Mr. Cadieux: That is correct. But with respect to just patching amendments, in that case I understand that clause 12 would not permit the restriction of the duration of this particular act, but if they reach a new agreement, they could do it for whatever term they would so choose, or sooner, as clause 5 states.

Senator Olson: Does that apply to more than just the container clause, or are we speaking specifically about that and only that?

Mr. Cadieux: The parties, senator, could reach a new collective agreement that would solve the container issue; and that is what I recommended they do last week. That is what we have been suggesting they do for the past 16 years, so obviously, if they wanted to sit down tomorrow and reach a new collective agreement, including the container clause and all other dispositions, wages, pensions, et cetera, I would welcome the event.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, shall clause 12 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 13 carry?

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, with respect to clause 13, I certainly want to express my deep disappointment that such a punitive provision is included in this legislation as the one which strips union officers of their functions.

The minister has cited precedent with respect to parliamentary approval of unseen provisions of a collective bargaining arrangement. He is right, there have been cases in the past, but I can't find any case where the Parliament of Canada has approved that a union officer, or a member of the union, be stripped of his office in the union because of a contravention of a provision of a bill. I know of no such case.

I know of a number of situations where laws were passed by Parliament—and no doubt there are many others—where penalties were provided for employers and for union members for failing to comply with the provisions of the back-to-work legislation. In 1982 in the case of the longshoring and related operations at ports on the west coast, the punishment related to the contempt of court provisions; in the case of the postal services, fines were provided for; and in the Great Lakes shipping instance, contempt of court and injunction proceedings were provided for.

In this particular case very substantial fines are provided for. In the case of an individual who is convicted of an offence there would be a fine of not less than $500 and not more than $1,000. The fines are between $10,000 and $50,000 in the case of a representative of an employer or of an employers' association.

Why, in addition to that, have we taken the further step of providing that an officer or representative of a union will be stripped of his functions for a period of five years? That is new; that is objectionable; and I object to it, even though it has been resorted to in the United States and in Quebec. I do not think a provision such as that would get through Parliament except in this emergency situation.

Personally, I would advise the minister that if at any future time this provision appears in a bill, it will require greater consideration than we have been able to give to it in this case.

Generally the practice in Canada has been to permit unions to run their own affairs. I have never heard of a government taking it upon itself to remove a union officer—at least not recently.

Senator Murray: Careful.

Senator MacEachen: We just removed them all in one case.

Senator Murray: You did it yourself.

Senator MacEachen: This is certainly unprecedented. I think it raises the question of the internal regulation of unions and employer associations. I think it is a bad proposal. It is the kind of proposal that should be considered very carefully in a committee and upon which we ought to hear evidence. Certainly, if this were not an emergency situation, I would be very tempted to move an amendment to strike this out of the bill because it really is unnecessary. Why must you strip a union representative of his union office for five years? That really is punitive and unnecessary. I regret that it appears in the legislation, and I hope that the minister will bear in mind that it ought to be reconsidered in the future and that it certainly ought not to appear in any future legislation, unless we have very good reason to put it into the general law.

That is all I want to say. I intended to be brief, but I wanted to express my deep disappointment at this provision.

Mr. Cadieux: I take your comments very seriously, senator, and I would have preferred, notwithstanding the fact that it is interesting for me to be in the Senate for the first time, not to be in this chamber for the first time with this legislation. This is legislation which we as a government do not like to pass, but circumstances oblige us to assume our responsibilities.

The circumstances of this particular case obliged me as Minister of Labour to introduce this legislation because of the incapacity, inability or unwillingness of the parties to come to a negotiated agreement after trying for 16 years. This legislation has been introduced and will be, we hope, passed because an emergency situation exists. Much as I do not like it, this is a serious piece of legislation.

Those clauses which include added penalties, as the honourable senator suggests, are new in federal legislation. That is a fact which I do not deny. However, they are not new in Canada, and we hope that no one will suffer this kind of penalty because the law will be respected by everyone as a law passed by the Parliament of Canada.

With respect to former practices, I would point out that I would not find it pleasant either to send people to jail because of contempt of court and so deprive them of their livelihood.

Senator MacEachen: The minister has defended the legislation and we have not opposed the legislation. What I oppose is this particular provision. I will take the advice of a former leader of mine and hold my nose and pass the clause.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, although I have already spoken on this particular point in dealing with the particular clause, I should simply, once again, like to register the repugnance I have in voting for this legislation when it includes a penalty provision which is totally out of balance as between the two sides.

With all respect to the minister's answer to Senator MacEachen a moment ago—he said it was necessary for him to assume his responsibilities and bring in this legislation, much as he dislikes it—that is not what we are talking about. We support this legislation and we all regret that this becomes necessary upon occasion, and particularly so on this occasion. That particular clause is not necessary in this instance and is repugnant to me. If I ever see it again in legislation coming forward, even if it should be emergency legislation, I intend to vote against it.

Senator Olson: Although we can agree with almost everything the minister said a few minutes ago about the problems involved in bringing in this kind of legislation to deal with a very important matter, I wonder if he would just go one step further and give us an undertaking in response to Senator MacEachen's concern that he will come back to the two houses of Parliament to remedy some of the objectionable parts of this bill in a situation where we can call witnesses to deal with the matter.

Mr. Cadieux: I am sure you would agree that it would be totally unacceptable for me, as a responsible minister, to undertake to do something in response to a situation which may or may not arise in the future.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, on this question the minister has argued that he has to assume his responsibilities to bring in and defend this piece of legislation. The implication is that he feels it is his responsibility to introduce a clause containing this specific provision.

Can he tell us what he has in mind? What does he anticipate? What is he trying to prevent by this particular punitive clause?

Mr. Cadieux: I hope I do not have to prevent anything. In coming forward with this type of legislation, where there are punitive clauses which impose fines and, in other cases, imprisonment if fines are not paid, we have considered all the recent legislation that has been passed. I have taken the decision, senator, to include this particular provision, first, because of the seriousness of this particular problem and, second, because I feel that if one is an officer of a union or an association, as in this case, one has an added responsibility to respect the law passed by the Parliament of Canada.

THE LATE HONOURABLE DONALD CAMPBELL JAMIESON, P.C.

TRIBUTES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I regret the necessity to rise this afternoon because of the sad duty I must undertake, and that is to pay tribute to the memory of the late Donald Jamieson, whose funeral was held in St. John's, Newfoundland, on Saturday last. The unexpected passing of Don Jamieson caused a great deal of sadness among his many friends in Newfoundland and in Canada as a whole. In rising to pay tribute to him, I am aware that he has earned the great praise which has been expressed about him since his death and that he occupied a very important place not only in the history of Canadian politics but in the history of Canadian broadcasting.

My association with Don Jamieson began when he was first elected to the House of Commons in a by-election in September 1966. He remained there until his resignation following the general election of 1979.

He became a minister of the Government of Canada in the fall of 1968 and remained as a minister until the general election of 1979. He began his ministerial career as Minister of Defence Production and concluded it as Canada's Secretary of State for External Affairs. In between those ministries, he discharged responsibilities as Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, Minister of Transport and Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. For those 11 years, as a member of the Government of Canada, he discharged heavy responsibilities and attracted much admiration not only for his ability to communicate his views and defend his position in the House of Commons but also for his accessibility as a minister and the firmness and competence with which he discharged his ministerial duties.

I must say that the general election of 1979 was a turning point in Mr. Jamieson's political career, because very shortly after that election he returned to Newfoundland to become leader of the Liberal Party in his native province; and that caused him to resign his federal seat.

I was involved in discussions with Don Jamieson as he made his decision to return to Newfoundland and become leader of the Liberal Party. I think it would be true to say that Don Jamieson expected, following the provincial election, to become Premier of Newfoundland. Of course, politics is unpredictable and brings its own disappointments; but in that case it must have been a real disappointment for Don because he was such an authentic Newfoundlander and because in the course of his ministerial career he had become in Canada as a whole the voice of Newfoundland.

Around the cabinet table he put forward forcibly the interests of Newfoundland, and he became part of the Atlantic ministerial group which at that time frequently acted to advance regional interests in the cabinet. As a minister from Nova Scotia, I had the occasion frequently to seek his assistance in the interests of my province, which he unfailingly gave when asked.

I must say that the years following his resignation to seek the leadership of his party in Newfoundland must have been difficult for him because there was much excitement in Ottawa. Had he remained in Ottawa, he would have become a minister in the new government of Mr. Trudeau following the 1980 election. But that was not to be, and subsequently he was appointed Canadian High Commissioner to London. I believe that Don, because of reasons which many honourable senators would understand, would have preferred to have become Canada's representative in Washington. Prior to Newfoundland's entry into Confederation, he had advocated the union, or an association, of Newfoundland with the United States, and perhaps he had that subconscious desire to probe life in that other country which did not become associated with what was to become the province of Newfoundland. As we know, Don accepted the decision of the people of Newfoundland and became a loyal Canadian, a tremendous Canadian who always took pains to express his satisfaction with Newfoundland's association and unity with Canada.

● (1420)

I was a close friend of Don Jamieson's. He used to say to me, "Allan, you are my best friend." I used to say to myself, "Well, that comes from Don Jamieson's generous heart," because we all know that he had a multitude of best friends. I shared many political, parliamentary and social occasions with him and remember one occasion which, afterwards, Don never ceased mentioning. He had been invited to my constituency to address a nominating meeting on my behalf. At the beginning of the meeting the chairman asked that O Canada be sung. All stood and as we began to sing the curtain closed leaving us there singing to the curtain. Don never forgot that. I should recount the constituency event in his own riding following his termination, his end in politics. Don had closed the book of politics and his constituency association held a parting dinner for him in Marystown. I was asked to come to speak at the testimonial dinner, which I did with great enthusiasm. But because of the enthusiastic hospitality which Don offered on that occasion, my return to Ottawa was delayed by 24 hours.

Don Jamieson never lost interest in conversation, whether it be politics, history or theology. Don had wide interests, and on those occasions when we met conversation was always interesting and, I must say, lengthy.

Honourable senators, I should stop here, but not because there is no more to be said. I want to express my own sadness at Don's passing and to acknowledge the important place he will hold in the political history of Newfoundland and of Canada as a whole. He will be greatly missed by all, but particularly by his widow, Barbara, and the members of his family—Donna, Heather, Roger and Debbie. I express my sympathy to them now, as I have already done by other communications, for I was unable to attend the funeral in Newfoundland because of longstanding commitments which I had made in connection with the chairmanship of a Canada-German meeting in Toronto. Barbara provided great support to Don. She was a friend to him. They shared all their triumphs and disappointments of life together. I must say that special sympathy must be extended to her and to all members of the family.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I may, I will join my voice to the hundreds of thousands of fellow Newfoundlanders and, indeed, millions of Canadians who mourn so deeply the passing of a great man. There are few people in Newfoundland who have made a more lasting contribution to that island province than Don Jamieson. I remember him well from way back.

I guess my first recollection of Don Jamieson was during the confederation campaign when he was actively espousing the cause of economic union with the United States and, being an innovator, he was flying over the city of St. John's in a very small aeroplane with a megaphone. I very often heard his voice booming at me from the sky, telling me what a great advantage it would be to join the land of milk and honey to the south.

His impact on all of us who grew up in Newfoundland was great. He was the first hockey broadcaster, and I remember well the play-by-play hockey broadcasts that he used to make. There is a story that I will tell with some humour because I remember Don Jamieson mostly for his great humour. He talked once of doing a play-by-play commentary of a professional wrestling match in New York. One of the wrestlers eventually came over and said to him: "Will you please slow down, sonny, we can't keep up with you."

Don Jamieson was indeed a great man; a man without rancour, without vitriol. I got to know him really well and learned to call him friend when I was in the provincial government and had occasion to come to Ottawa almost on a weekly basis, as ministers from Newfoundland do who need friends and need help from the federal cabinet. For all the world knew, we were of one political party. Don Jamieson never said no and never turned his back. He was always as helpful as one could reasonably expect anyone to be. He shared all of our major problems, none of which was his doing. Whether it was our liner board mill, our oil refinery or any of the other major disasters that we faced from time to time, Don was always there and helped as much as he could. I know that I will certainly miss him and that all of us in Newfoundland will miss him greatly. I share the condolences that will be sent to Barbara, to his three daughters, to Roger and to his brothers, Basil and Colin. Canada is the less for his passing, and Newfoundland mourns him greatly.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I do not intend to repeat what has been said by my colleagues, Senator MacEachen and Senator Doody, but I want to add a few thoughts to give honourable senators and others some idea of the type of man that Canada has just lost.

Don Jamieson and I started out originally as political enemies. As Senator MacEachen has said, Don supported what was called economic union with the United States. The leader of that movement was Chesley Crosbie, father of the present Minister of Transport and Newfoundland representative in the Canadian government, the Honourable John Crosbie. On the other hand, I supported confederation and at that time, of course, the two of us were in political conflict. At no time during that rather exhausting period of approximately three years prior to 1949 did Don ever, to my knowledge, utter anything that was derogatory about me. I, of course, attempted to extend the same courtesy. However, I was supporting Joey Smallwood and Don was supporting Chesley Crosbie, and that was that.

We all know what the ultimate result of that was, but there was no animosity before or afterwards. As Senator Doody and Senator MacEachen have already said, when that great fight was over, nobody was a better Canadian than Don Jamieson.

He was a remarkable man in many ways. Don was only 12 years of age when his father died, and because he was the oldest that meant that he had to leave school and go to work to help support the family, a responsibility that he undertook for many years. Because of that, he had no opportunity to acquire a full, formal education. Nevertheless, he became a great orator and a great politician. His ability to use words was extraordinary, his memory was fantastic, and his ability to work great. Don Jamieson was one of the greatest Newfoundlanders we have produced.

Relying on his great memory, he would go on radio, and later television, week after week, month after month and year after year to give a 15-minute news report without having a note in front of him, and most of that report dealt with events that had just occurred. Even when the event he was reporting had occurred only half an hour before his news report, from listening to him one would have thought that he had memorized his report a long time in advance. He had a golden baritone voice and, as a lover of music, I always appreciated that. In my view, Don Jamieson was one of the greatest orators Newfoundland has had.

Newfoundland is famous—and I do not say this in any boastful fashion, but it is generally considered to be true—for its orators. It has turned out an incredible number of good speakers, and I think that has something to do with the fact—and I do not say this in any racial sense—that so many of our people are of Welsh descent. There are Lewises, Williamsons, Thomases, Joneses and Roberts. Those families all came from Wales. There are an incredible number of people of Welsh descent in Newfoundland, considering the size of the population. Of course, one third of Newfoundland is pure Irish—and I use the word “pure” advisedly—and that, too, may explain why we have produced so many great speakers. If I were asked to list the four greatest speakers I have known, I do not know of anyone who would be superior to Peter Cashin—an uncle, by the way, of Richard Cashin and son of a former Prime Minister of Newfoundland, Sir Michael Cashin—and the Honourable Gordon Bradley, who was also summoned to the Senate. As a matter of fact, I am in logical descent, from a senatorial point of view, from Gordon Bradley. He had a tremendous voice. Then, I would also place on that list the names of Joey Smallwood and Don Jamieson.

We shall miss Don Jamieson. I was very happy that so many honourable senators and members of the House of Commons were able to attend the funeral in St. John's, Newfoundland, in spite of the bad weather Newfoundland has experienced lately.

I know honourable senators would want me—as has already been suggested by Senators Doody and MacEachen—to convey to his lovely, gracious and charming wife, Barbara, whose virtues were extolled by Senator MacEachen, the deepest sympathy of all honourable senators.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I had not intended to speak today because, along with other honourable senators, I paid my respects to the late Don Jamieson in St. John's, Newfoundland, last Saturday. However, Senator Frith has encouraged me to make reference to the time when he, Senator Graham, Senator Grafstein and I were actively involved in broadcasting. The contribution Don Jamieson made to Canadian broadcasting was considerable. Before Don Jamieson entered public life, there was a problem with the public and the private elements of broadcasting in this country; it was a sort of “them” and “us” attitude. The co-existence of the public and private elements was a rather tenuous thing at best. It was Jamieson's leadership, when he was the President of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, that I think caused the private broadcasting element of the country to recognize that public broadcasting was still the paramount agency, though they also had an enormously important role to play. They still have an important role to play today, although they now tend to express their legitimate concerns with more moderation than they did at that time. I am speaking of some 30 years ago. It was Don Jamieson who was largely responsible for that recognition.

As a Conservative from Nova Scotia, I was sent to Newfoundland on a futile suicidal mission to try to defeat the Smallwood government. Every afternoon, when I got back to the hotel, I would receive a call from Jamieson. He would say, “Now that you have finished your mischief, would you like to come home for dinner?” We remained great friends.

At the risk of repetition—because I have already told this story in this chamber on one previous occasion—let me say that on one occasion I asked Don Jamieson how, with such a close race in the referendum to join Canada, those who voted against Confederation took the result, and how they reconciled themselves to the result. Jamieson said: “Well, my son, I had a half interest in a race horse in Corner Brook once, and the only way we could get that nag out of the starting gate was to put a quart of demerara rum in its feed bag.” I asked: “Did it ever win any races?” He said: “No, but it was the happiest loser you ever saw.”

He was a distinguished person and a dear friend and I shall miss him greatly.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I do not want to speak about the career of Don Jamieson because that has already been covered, but I do want to say a word or two about the man himself. I was indeed fortunate to be able to attend the funeral held in St. John's last Saturday.

Don's life has touched many people of different persuasions and different walks of life. We often hear that Canadians are too shy, that they are too reluctant to wave the flag, that they lack a sense of patriotism and that they do not have enough heroes. One could never say that about Don Jamieson. He was never shy, he always waved the flag, and I think it can be truly said that he was a genuine patriot, both of Newfoundland and of Canada.

• (1440)

It is difficult to imagine anyone who was more fully involved, indeed, more fully alive. It is difficult to imagine anybody who loved his family more, who had a greater love for his province and, indeed, for his country. I remember him as having an incredible habit of inquiry, an incredible thirst for knowledge, a great curiosity. He learned everything he could—not just about the large issues but about the small issues of the day as well. He always enjoyed, indeed, he contemplated and savoured, new challenges in life. He had the courage of his convictions and he had the ability to make up his own mind—not in a spirit of selfishness but in a spirit of selfless responsibility to others. He was innovative; he never lacked for new ideas, he never lacked for new ways of trying to solve problems or to do things. He was never imprisoned by the past and he was always building on yesterday. When it came time to act in the public interest, he did so in a way that was always meaningful and free from prejudice. We will always remember his resonant, indeed at times, his thundering eloquence, and we will never forget his legendary stories and his remarkable humour. He was my close friend as, indeed, he was to many of you. In fact, if truth be told, he was one of my heroes and he really did make a difference. So, I join with all honourable senators in extending to Barbara and all members of their family an expression of very sincere sympathy with many happy memories.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, it has occurred to me as an afterthought that honourable senators might be interested in the fact that this book I am holding, called The Book of Newfoundland, one of six volumes of which J.R. Smallwood was the publisher—Volume III, page 70, in case you want to make a note—contains a lengthy article that is, in fact, the equivalent of a small book. The title of the article is, "I Saw The Fight For Confederation", and the author is Donald C. Jamieson. Anyone who is interested in Don's remarkable career would get a good insight from Don's own appraisal of the struggle.

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I would like to add my words of tribute to the late Don Jamieson. The magic of public speaking is a lost art. The ability to elevate and transform public audiences by the spoken word may soon be forgotten. When we think of this changing state of public affairs, we remember with kindness and great respect Don Jamieson who was a living bridge between the oral tradition of public speaking and the new electronic state of broadcasting, both radio and television.

[Senator Graham.]

I was first introduced to the late Don Jamieson under very exciting circumstances. I was introduced to the magic of Don Jamieson in Hamilton by our colleague, Senator Dan Lang, who was then the Ontario campaign chairman of the Liberal Party in the 1965 general election. Don Jamieson was asked to be the announcer of a very historic event—the last political rally not only of that campaign but what was to be the last political rally of the late Lester Pearson. It was Don Jamieson's great broadcasting presence serving as the over-the-air and behind-the-scenes speaker who transformed a rather difficult and what might have been otherwise a disastrous political event into a compelling and exciting piece of electronic history. So when I think of Don Jamieson, I think of how, by the magic of his words and his voice, he could take an ordinary event and transform it into a memorable electric moment of political history. Recently—just over two years ago—I had the occasion to listen to Don speak under very different yet equally impressive circumstances. He was one of the guest speakers at the Oxford Union where he had been invited to debate the issue of the future of the Commonwealth. Even there in that greatest of oratorical forums, once again, Don's flights of oratory lifted the audience. Not only did he transform the audience but, more important than that, he carried the debate and his side won.

Don Jamieson exemplified the Canadian dream to many other young Canadians. He demonstrated how a man could rise above adverse circumstances by sheer ability and the force of his personality. He was a great public speaker, a historic broadcaster, an outstanding political figure and a great diplomat. Above all, he was a great Canadian. For me he will always remain alive. What greater tribute could one pay to a friend than to say to his family and legion of admirers that Don Jamieson lives on; the lilt of his voice and the grace of his words will remain alive forever in our hearts and in the pages of Canadian history. We will miss you, Don.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

NEW SENATORS

WORDS OF WELCOME

Hon. Lorna M. Marsden: Honourable senators, I would like to extend, if I may, a word of congratulations and a warm welcome to the three new senators who have joined us this afternoon.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Marsden: It is, of course, always a pleasure to welcome new colleagues into this chamber, but this is an especially historic occasion for the Senate. It is not often that we have three new senators on one day, but we have never before in the history of this chamber had three senators, all of whom are of the proper sex. This brings to 26 the number of women of Canada who have ever been appointed members of the Canadian Senate and reduces to one the number of provinces that have never yet been represented by a woman. Only Saskatchewan, I think—if my history is correct—has never had as a representative a woman in this chamber. But, of course, none of them is here because of her sex, they are all here because of their fine personal qualities and the work that they have already contributed in their own communities to their families and to public life in our country.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Marsden: They are here because of their intelligence and their understanding of their respective provinces and of Canada. Nonetheless, I think it is important that they are here not only for those reasons but also as women. No doubt there will be many occasions in the future when we will disagree about matters of substance and of policy, but I believe we will all have a great deal in common, and I look forward to many productive years of work together. Once again, my very best wishes and congratulations.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

● (1450)

Once again, on behalf of my colleagues on this side, I want to bid a very warm welcome to them and thank Senator Marsden for having done so on behalf of the opposition.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I, too, would like to join in welcoming the new senators, Senator Cochrane, Senator Rossiter and Senator Spivak, to this chamber and to the new and quite vigorous back bench on this side of the chamber.

I believe their appointment has helped, slowly but surely, to redress the evident imbalance of gender in this chamber. As an Albertan, where the battle to give women the right to be appointed to this chamber began, to see the three of them march down the centre aisle was of special significance to me.

They all bring a wealth of experience and sensitivity to this place and I look forward to serving with them.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matters of bills and estimates as are referred to it.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before granting leave, is there any budgetary problem with reference to this? Is it covered by a budget?

Senator Nurgitz: Yes, honourable senators, I am informed that this is covered by the previously approved budget.

Senator Frith: I believe that honourable senators should grant leave.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

OIL AND GAS INDUSTRY—RELIEF OF SEVERE ECONOMIC PROBLEMS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate in his capacity as Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. Following the First Ministers' Conference in Vancouver a few days ago, the Prime Minister acknowledged—and we appreciate that he did acknowledge this—that the severe unemployment and the depressed economic conditions in the oil and gas industry were national rather than simply provincial or regional problems. He went on to say that he would recommend to the cabinet that some additional help be extended to the oil and gas industry. Could the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations give us some indication of what he meant by that, and, perhaps more specifically, when we can expect a substantive announcement? When can those people suffering from these severe economic conditions get some relief from this problem?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I would have thought that Senator Olson, for his part, would have acknowledged the important steps already taken by this government to come to the aid of the energy industry in this country. However, with respect to the statements attributed to the Prime Minister by the honourable senator and by the media within the last day or two, I regret that I am not in a position to make any announcements today.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will acknowledge everything that can be acknowledged—

Senator Frith: That won't take long!

Senator Olson: Yes, it won't take long, but I would hardly expect that the Leader of the Government would want me to recite that as part of a preamble to a question. However, he says that he is not aware of this statement. I am sure that the minister responsible for federal-provincial relations must have been directly involved in the activity and the process that led up to the Prime Minister's statement. I can think of no more important task to be performed by a minister with those responsibilities. Surely he can give us some indication as to what it involves and when we can expect a further announcement in this regard.

I might also say as an aside that this assertion by the Prime Minister that he will recommend something to cabinet is a departure in public relations. I have never before heard it put quite that way by a Prime Minister. Perhaps we are going to have to learn what that means and I am trying to find out. There are some deadly serious aspects to this question, in spite of a little levity in this regard on the part of both the minister and myself. I think that for the people who are desperately seeking some way out of the economic problems in which they find themselves, it is wrong to raise false hopes about a possible future for them in the oil and gas industry, where they might have earned their living all of their working lives.

I asked when we might expect a further announcement because the minister will realize that there has to be such an announcement soon if it is to be effective for this season. Some four or five weeks ago I raised a series of questions pointing out to him that if companies were to undertake any sort of work in the field—whether it be further seismic exploration, drilling or whatever—they needed to have such information soon so that their plans could be put in place and their contracts made in time. Much of the western basin is muskeg area where operations can be carried out only during the season when the ground is frozen.

I ask the minister again whether he can give some indication of the time at which we can expect such an announcement. Thousands of people are standing by waiting for some positive action so that they can have some hope for activity in their field.

Senator Murray: Just for the record, let me state very quickly—and I can state it quickly—that this government dismantled the most offensive, confiscatory and counterproductive aspects of the honourable senator's National Energy Policy.

Senator Olson: You have said that dozens of times.

Senator Murray: Further to that, we did away with the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax. Those are not inconsiderable measures to have been taken by the Government of Canada. Indeed, in respect of the PGRT, it has been dismantled at a cost in revenue of some $800 million to the federal treasury.

Having said that, I also remind the honourable senator that there was a public exchange on this very subject at the First Ministers' Conference between the Prime Minister, who stated that energy is not a regional problem, not one confined to Alberta, but a national problem—and opportunity—and the Premier of Alberta, who made certain representations on behalf of his province. Since that time, there has been a private meeting between the Prime Minister and the Premier of Alberta. Contrary to what Senator Olson has said, there is nothing new in having a minister—even a Prime Minister—indicate publicly that the government will be taking certain measures under consideration. That is what the Prime Minister has said. I expect that in due course the government will be seized of these matters and that eventually there will be the sort of announcement that my honourable friend is seeking.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am amazed at that reply.

Senator Frith: And he is not easily amazed!

Senator Olson: It sounds as though the minister did not know what went on at the federal-provincial conference. The Prime Minister stated very plainly—and it was not some misinterpretation on the part of the press or the media because it was shown on television; I watched it myself—that there was some additional action that would be taken by the federal government to give relief to this industry. I did not ask the government leader to repeat—as he does every time I ask him a question—all of the things the government has done that he thinks are so great for the oil industry. Even after all of that has been applied, the Prime Minister has acknowledged that some additional action needs to be taken. That is the undertaking he gave in Vancouver and, by the way, in Calgary, too.

I ask the minister this: What is in the mind of the government, and when will an announcement in that regard be made? Will it be made in time to be effective for those people who are in desperate need this season? I hope that the minister will not take us down that trail, as he has done at least a dozen times in the past few months, of repeating the same things he has reiterated today. I want him to focus specifically on what the Prime Minister said—that is, that there will be additional action. What is it and when can we expect it?

• (1510)

Senator Murray: I am sorry that the honourable senator is so guilt-ridden about the past and does not like to be reminded. I will simply tell him in one short, sharp sentence that the policy of the government in this matter will be announced in due course.

Senator Olson: As a final supplementary—perhaps we should never say “final,” but I will—that is all that we are going to get. You are going to come around and raise hopes, but never give an indication of what it is in substance so that people can rely on it.

Senator Murray: Our past performance is the best indicator of our future action.

Senator Olson: The highest level of unemployment in the gas and oil industry in the history of Canada! That's part of your legacy, too, if you want to talk about results of your actions.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

DRUG PRICING—EFFECT OF PROVISIONS OF BILL C-22

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning the subject matter of Bill C-22, generic and non-generic drugs and the price thereof. A good deal of opinion has been exchanged in the House and in the press, and there has also been an exchange of information. However, I have a specific question to which I would ask the Leader of the Government to obtain an answer. He may have to take this as notice. It is a more narrow question than some which have been posed elsewhere. On the basis of the apparently extensive studies undertaken by the government—I say “apparently” because the minister in the other place has said they have done many studies—can the government say whether, in its opinion, the cost to the consumer of newly introduced drugs will be higher if Bill C-22 is passed than it would have been if the bill were not passed?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I suggest that it is a line of questioning which could be put to officials and/or to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs if we were able to proceed with the pre-study of the bill in question. That bill is now before the other place, as the Deputy Leader of the Opposition knows, and I would suggest that if the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, his colleagues and my honourable friends opposite were willing, we could facilitate the pre-study of the bill by that committee.

If the Deputy Leader of the Opposition wishes, I could attempt to bring an answer to his specific question, but I invite him to assist us in facilitating the pre-study of the bill by the standing committee.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not disagree with the Leader of the Government that the answer to my question could usefully be explored by the committee on the occasion of a pre-study of the bill. There are some perhaps temporary problems about the pre-study of Bill C-22. The Leader of the Government and his deputy were good enough to suggest that to us and to explain why they thought it was appropriate. We have also explained why we think that for the moment there are some difficulties about proceeding with the pre-study at this time, and for that reason I would ask the minister, without disagreeing with what he said earlier, to try to bring in an answer. Perhaps, by the time we receive his answer, we might be in a position to use it as a springboard to a study by the committee.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, as a supplementary question, can the Leader of the Government tell me why this matter should go to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce rather than to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology? I am not sure that bankers know very much about drugs, although they may know a great deal about costs. Basically, we are thinking about the health of Canadians, particularly those on low incomes, senior citizens, those in need and single-parent families who have to purchase expensive drugs. In my opinion, that is more important than the legal or constitutional matters involved with this bill. Why should not this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology where it could be studied by those who have a more scientific knowledge?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is because the rules of this place provide that bills affecting patents and royalties—and this applies to Bill C-22—be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I trust that the honourable senator would agree with me that the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, distinguished as they are, have no monopoly on either knowledge or compassion.

Senator Bonnell: In reply to my friend, I agree with him. If that is the rule of the Senate, then I will obey the rule. But sometimes we can change our rules by unanimous consent, and perhaps we could obtain unanimous consent to do that on this occasion.

Senator Murray: Why?

Senator Bonnell: We could always attend the meetings of the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, participate in the debate and ask any questions we wish. Perhaps the chairman of that committee will notify the members of the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee of the meetings of his committee, in addition to placing a notice on the notice boards.

I have a further question for the Leader of the Government—

Senator Murray: Is it on the same subject?

Senator Bonnell: No, it is on a different subject.

Senator Murray: May I say, as a former chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, that the membership of that committee is as warm-hearted a group of senators as I have ever met.

Senator Frith: How often have you attended meetings of the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee?

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary to Senator Frith's question in connection with Bill C-22, and also concerning the consequences of that bill on the pricing of drugs. Without commenting on what is contained in the bill itself, can the Leader of the Government tell us what the intent of the bill is, if it is not to raise prices? Why would the multinational pharmaceutical companies have spent millions of dollars and lobbied for years to get us to put in these changes if there will not be an increase in prices? Surely they are not doing it for our welfare? That has never been the case in the past.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that is a debating point, and the oral Question Period is no time for a debate. First, let me inform the honourable senator that we need this legislation because it will bring new drugs to Canada faster than is now the case. The introduction of new drugs in Canada is being delayed under the present dispensation. Second, I wish to tell the honourable senator that there is hanging in the balance, with this legislation, tens of millions of dollars of investment, research and jobs in this country in that sector. The honourable senator could get up and ask three more questions, but I suggest that if he wants to ask questions on the bill, he should go to the committee when the bill is before it; and if he wants to debate the bill, he should wait until it arrives here.

Senator Lucier: Can the Leader of the Government tell me if it means that we are now going to get all kinds of research money spent in Canada by the multinationals, and why they never spent a nickel in Canada before 1969, when they had every opportunity to do so?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator should look at the plans that have already been announced by those companies and the statements which have already been made by the minister on that matter. Once again, the honourable senator is raising debating points, which he can raise on second reading or, indeed, in committee.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I will be doing that. I would tell the Leader of the Government that I have looked at the plans. That is why I am asking the question.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, as a supplementary, can the Leader of the Government tell us what organizations in this country, apart from drug companies and a few business firms, have asked for this legislation, and how widespread is the opposition to it, including from senior citizens, the labour movement and other organizations? Is anyone really for it, except the Tories and the drug companies?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the honourable senator has asked a classic question that can be put to the minister and to officials at the committee meeting, and to which he will receive a reply that may surprise him.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, with the greatest respect, I think that that answer is most inadequate. What I asked was whether or not there were widespread bodies of public opinion in Canada that want this legislation, or is it a fact that many of those organizations to which I have referred have gone on record as opposing this action by the government, believing that it will cause an astronomical increase in drug prices and that it will be a detriment to the health of Canadians?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the government has explained, and I have tried to explain in a word or two, the implications of this legislation in terms of the introduction of new drugs into Canada, in terms of investment and research in this sector in Canada and in terms of international agreements to which Canada is party and should respect. In all these matters the government has made a judgment call that this legislation is demonstrably in the national interest.

Senator Olson: Like what you did for the oil industry.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

NATIVE LAND CLAIMS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As the minister knows, it has been some months since the Coolican Report on Native Claims was made public. He will also know that the natives of this country are very supportive of that report. When will the minister or the government be announcing a new policy on native claims?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my friend is quite correct in the two premises upon which he has based his question. As for the question itself, I can tell him that the government has not yet taken a decision on that matter. However, I hope that one will be taken shortly.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—POST OFFICE CLOSURES AND AMALGAMATIONS

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, first, I would like to tell my good friend, the Leader of the Government, that if he had let me go on with my separate question instead of interrupting me when I was about to put it, he would not have received all the supplementary questions.

Senator Doody: Another warm-hearted senator.

Senator Argue: Even when he talks, he does not say more than he has to.

Senator McElman: Cold-blooded and warm-hearted.

Senator Bonnell: It is an old trick that you learn after a while, that if you do not say any more than you have to, you will get fewer questions.

An article in the Ottawa Citizen of November 25 says that post offices within eight kilometres of each other will be considered for amalgamation or closure, and that this plan has already been approved by cabinet. Will the minister tell us how many post offices in Atlantic Canada will be closed or amalgamated, particularly in Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, without accepting the veracity of the statement which the honourable senator has just quoted from the press, because I have not read the entire article, I will tell him that I shall endeavour to obtain the information he seeks concerning the plans of that crown corporation for the Atlantic provinces.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government tell me how many homes will lose home delivery because of this new policy? Does the Leader of the Government have any idea of how many thousands or millions of people will lose home delivery?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I suggest that that question ought to be put on the Order Paper, and we shall endeavour to bring in as accurate a reply as we can.

SECURITY OF NEW MAIL BOXES

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, before I put the question on the Order Paper, will the Leader of the Government seek out some information about the new postal boxes? According to last evening's national news, some people in the post office say that they cannot get into them at all, that the key does not work, while other people say that you can easily lift them and take all the mail out. Can the leader tell us anything new about the security of these boxes?

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have answers to a number of questions. With your permission, I would like to follow the usual procedure. I will identify the question, but will not read the answer unless specifically asked to do so. I would ask that all unread answers be printed as part of today's proceedings.

[Senator Bonnell.]

CANADA POST CORPORATION

CLOSING OF NORWOOD GROVE, ST. BONIFACE, POST OFFICE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the first delayed answer is in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 8 last by the Honourable Senator Guay regarding Canada Post Corporation—Closing of Norwood Grove, St. Boniface, Post Office.

The meetings referred to were arranged by officials of Canada Post Corporation in response to a request from the Norwood Grove Save the Post Office Committee to discuss proposed changes in the area. The list contained some 40 names determined by the committee as being representative of businesses, seniors and residents of the area. All three meetings were attended by the executive of Save the Post Office Committee.

With regard to the senator's concerns about the security personnel, the Mid-West Divisional administration is but one tenant in a large office tower in downtown Winnipeg. As with any large office tower, the building management provides after-hours security in the lobby and only authorized persons are permitted to enter. These security people were not hired by Canada Post Corporation. They are retained by the building management to control access to its premises and to provide security for all the tenants of the building.

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED TUNNEL OR CAUSEWAY BETWEEN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND MAINLAND

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 8 and again on November 6 by the Honourable Senator Bonnell regarding Proposed Tunnel or Causeway between Prince Edward Island and the Mainland.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I wonder if the deputy leader would read the answer. Some 125,000 Islanders are waiting to hear it.

Senator Doody: Certainly, I can. Does the honourable senator want me to?

Senator Bonnell: Yes, please.

Senator Doody: The government is actively considering at this time whether it should undertake financial, socio-economic, environmental and other related studies in order to establish the viability of a fixed crossing of the Northumberland Strait between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. The government has received a number of unsolicited proposals from private sector consortia for the construction of a fixed crossing and has received inquiries from other private sector groups interested in submitting proposals.

Senator Frith: There's tomorrow's headline! What a shaker that is!

Senator Bonnell: Are they going to pay for the study?

Senator Doody: Well, really—

Senator Bonnell: Perhaps that is a question for tomorrow.

BANKING

DESIGNATION OF TORONTO AS INTERNATIONAL CENTRE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 28 last by the Honourable Senator Grafstein regarding Banking—Designation of Toronto as International Centre—Government Policy.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I hear that one, please?

Senator Doody: Certainly.

As the Minister of Finance announced in his budget speech of February 26, 1986, the government is prepared to facilitate the establishment of international banking centres in Montreal and Vancouver.

The government's objective in pursuing this matter is not to discriminate against Toronto. The government's purpose, rather, is to enable Montreal and Vancouver to establish and enhance their roles as international banking centres and, toward this end, the objective is to attract a portion of the international banking activity that is presently conducted outside Canada and in so doing enhance the position of Vancouver and Montreal in overseas commerce.

In any event, consultations on this topic have been and will continue to be held with the banking community and the provinces, including Ontario. One may rest assured that the concerns of Ontario—and specifically, those of the community of Toronto—will continue to be addressed in the course of these discussions.

Senator Frith: That is very reassuring—I think.

PENITENTIARIES

PROPOSED PRISON AT PORT-CARTIER, QUEBEC—FACTORS GOVERNING LOCATION—EFFECT OF ADDITIONAL COST ON INMATE PROGRAMS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 28 last by the Honourable Senator Hastings regarding Proposed Prison at Port-Cartier, Quebec—Factors Governing Location—Effect of Additional Cost on Inmate Programs.

(The answer follows:)

There is a need for a federal institution in Port-Cartier. According to table 7.51 in the Auditor General's report there will be a surplus of 30 protective custody units in Quebec by 1992-93. These figures include the 250 cells in Port-Cartier. If Port-Cartier was not built there would be a shortage of 220 protective custody unit cells.

The need for cells is considered by region. The needs in each region must be addressed individually.

Expenditure restraints are not connected and are irrelevant to the construction or renovation of any penitentiary in Canada.

DOUBLE-BUNKING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 28 last by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn regarding Penitentiaries—Double Bunking—Government Action.

(The answer follows:)

The Solicitor General is well aware of the problem of double-bunking. Strategies such as the Exchange of Services Agreements with a number of provinces are now being implemented. Other options such as the use of community alternatives and the utilization of special purpose facilities are also being explored.

IMMIGRATION

STATUS OF INTERESTED LAPLANDERS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 28 last by the Honourable Senator Watt regarding Immigration—Status of Interested Laplanders—Government Policy.

(The answer follows:)

No approach has been made to the Visa Office in Stockholm, Sweden. During a mission to northern Sweden and Norway in May 1986, North West Territories Minister of Economic Development, Tagak Curley, and members of the North Western Territories Business Council informally discussed the possibility of bringing some Samis (Lapps) to Canada. Visa officials believe the idea was to gain expertise in herding and marketing of meat as a speciality product. Later, mission members observed that Canadian conditions would not allow "extensive breeding" as practised in Sweden. There had apparently been no follow-up to this visit.

The effect of Chernobyl on the reindeer business in Sweden has been serious and the duration is yet uncertain. There are about 700 Sami households in Sweden entirely or partially dependent on reindeer as their livelihood. Of course, the Samis have full access to the benefits of the Swedish welfare state and no hardship is being suffered. Although there was some emigration of Scandinavian Samis to Canada around the turn of the century, they failed to establish themselves, and most of them returned.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—DEFINITION OF NATIONAL TREATMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 4 last by the Honourable Senator Grafstein regarding Canada-United States Relations—Bilateral Trade Negotiations—Definition of National Treatment.

(The answer follows:)

The GATT definition of national treatment as it relates to trade in goods states that the products of any contracting party shall be accorded treatment no less favourable than that accorded to like products of national origin with respect to all laws, regulations and requirements affecting their internal sale, offering for sale, purchase, transportation, distribution or use.

National treatment could arise in the context of the Canada-U.S. negotiations in several areas, for example government procurement. If successfully negotiated, national treatment would give Canadian products access to U.S. markets including the government procurement market in the United States on the same basis and on an equal footing with U.S. products, subject to whatever exceptions are agreed upon. The same would apply to U.S. products in Canada.

Since the bilateral agreement has not yet been negotiated, it would be premature to comment on how particular sectors will be treated.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

CRITERIA FOR APPROVING PROPOSALS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 30 and again on November 6 by the Honourable Senator Frith regarding Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency—Criteria for Approving Proposals.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Is that a long answer?

Senator Doody: No, it is not particularly long.

Below is further information on the four criteria for approving proposals, including details on the assessment procedures:

Eligible Person: A Canadian Taxpayer.

Eligible Location: The facility must be located in a Cape Breton designated region which includes all of Cape Breton Island as well as Mulgrave and its surrounding industrial lands.

Eligible Activity: The project must be in one of the following seven sectors:

1. Manufacturing and Processing
2. Technical Services to Business
3. Certain Tourism Operations

[Senator Doody.]

4. Farming

5. Logging

6. Oil, Gas and Mineral Resources

7. Receiving, Storing and Shipping Goods Owned by Others (Warehousing).

Eligible Assets: These assets are as defined in the Income Tax Act, section 127(1) and (b) and in section 4604 of the Income Tax Act Regulations, and in general include buildings, machinery and equipment.

Upon receipt of an application form, DRIE will determine the eligibility of the proposed project and will advise the applicant in writing whether or not the proposed project is eligible for CBITC. If eligible, the applicant will be required to advise the department in writing once the assets are acquired and in use. DRIE will visit the company's facility and ascertain that the company has carried out a project consistent with the Income Tax Act legislation and issue a CBITC certificate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I want to make two points. First, I think that is a very good answer and I thank the government for giving me the details that I asked for. I therefore do not wish to proceed any further with that question.

However, when Senator Bonnell wanted to pursue the answer to a question he had asked, the impression was given that it would not be acceptable or in order for him to do so. When Senator Roblin occupied the position I now occupy, he developed a style whereby, when we gave a delayed answer, he would ask questions arising out of the answer. While at first I felt that that was not in order, I must say that it led to some rather interesting debate and development of material that was found in questions. Therefore, I just want to note for the record that I think we have in recent years decided that if a senator asks that an answer be read and further if he wants to ask what amounts to a supplementary question or a follow-up question, it is acceptable in this chamber to do so.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, just because I did so does not mean it was right.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I must say that that remark reminds me of the opening remarks of counsel before a Court of Appeal panel who said, by way of introducing the appeal: "This is an appeal from a judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Roblin, but there are other grounds for the appeal."

Senator Roblin: You may trot them out.

INDUSTRY

AEROSPACE—AWARDING OF CF-18 SERVICE CONTRACT— REJECTION OF IMP BID—GOVERNMENT REASONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 6 last by the Honourable Senators Graham and MacEachen regarding Industry—Aerospace—Awarding of CF-18 Service Contract—Rejection of IMP Bid—Government Reasons.

(The answer follows:)

The government issued a request for proposals for the CF-18 systems engineering and maintenance contract in August 1985. Proposals from IMP, Bristol and Canadair were received in November 1985 and were examined by an evaluation team, composed of 75 officials from the Departments of Defence, Supply and Services and Regional Industrial Expansion. This team concluded that none of the consortia had presented fully compliant proposals. All had deficiencies; all were requested to repair them. Until the evaluation of the revised proposals took place, IMP was still a contender. The revised proposals were assessed against the same criteria. This time, it was concluded that the IMP proposal was technically non-compliant. Even at that point, the company could not be officially counted out solely on the basis of the evaluation report. In any competition, no contender can be formally discarded until the person or body with the authority to make the decision to award a contract has taken that decision. In this case, that body was the Treasury Board and the decision was taken on October 31.

Some honourable senators have asked for further explanation of the term "technical non-compliance". I am sure you will appreciate that the specific details of the bids are commercially confidential and cannot be released without the consent of the companies concerned. IMP and Bristol have been offered a full debriefing on their bids, and all companies will be asked to permit the release of as much information as possible. Until we receive the company responses to these requests, there is little more that can be added to the basic statement that IMP did not demonstrate to the satisfaction of the government that, based on the company's proposal, it could initiate, manage and accomplish the project on schedule in accordance with the provisions set forth in the statement of work.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANCELLATION OF VISIT OF VICE-PRESIDENT OF NICARAGUA

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 6 last by the Honourable Senator MacEachen regarding Foreign Affairs—Cancellation of Visit of Vice-President of Nicaragua.

(The answer follows:)

The planned visit by the Vice-President of Nicaragua, Dr. Sergio Ramirez, was to be an unofficial visit because it was initiated at short notice by the Nicaraguan government and did not result from an official invitation by the Canadian government.

It is common practice in international diplomacy for some visits to be organized in this way. While they are normally designated unofficial visits, the visitor is given full recognition as a member of his government. In the case of Dr. Ramirez, he was to have called on the Secretary of State for External Affairs for a substantial discussion about the situation in Nicaragua, and several other high-level calls had been arranged. The inability of the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister to receive Dr. Ramirez had nothing to do with the fact that the visit was to be an unofficial one. The visit coincided with the parliamentary recess, and the programs of the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister did not allow for a meeting with Dr. Ramirez.

The government remains willing to receive a visit by Dr. Ramirez at a mutually agreed time and will again ensure that he is received in a manner appropriate to his status as the Vice-President of a country with which Canada maintains normal diplomatic relations.

CANADA-U.S.S.R. RELATIONS

SPEECH OF CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO UNITED NATIONS— REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF GOVERNMENT POLICY ON SOVIET OCCUPATION OF AFGHANISTAN

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 6 last by the Honourable Senator MacEachen regarding Canada-U.S.S.R. Relations—Speech of Canadian Ambassador to United Nations—Request for Clarification of Government Policy on Soviet Occupation of Afghanistan.

(The answer follows:)

The statement made by Ambassador Lewis at the United Nations General Assembly in the Plenary Debate dealt specifically with Afghanistan, not with Canada's policy to the U.S.S.R. The statement was not merely consistent with the government's attitude to the Soviet occupation of that country; this intervention was made on instruction from the Department of External Affairs.

The Canadian government deplored the invasion when it happened in 1979 and took strong measures to demonstrate this. The passage of time diminishes neither the continuing unacceptability of the Soviet government's actions in Afghanistan, including massive violations of human rights, nor the Canadian government's determination to work hard to obtain a settlement that will end this foreign oppression and the occupation of a neutral country. If anything, since then, Soviet actions have become even more unjustified and reprehensible.

INDUSTRY

SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION—FUTURE OF PLANT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 6 last by the Honourable Senator Graham regarding Industry—Sydney Steel Corporation—Future of Plant.

(The answer follows:)

The market update being conducted by A.D. Little of Canada Ltd. commenced on October 1st, 1986, and is scheduled for completion this year.

TRADE

IMBALANCE BETWEEN CANADA AND U.S.S.R.—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 6 last by the Honourable Senator Argue regarding Trade—Imbalance between Canada and U.S.S.R.—Government Policy.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Perhaps the answer to my question with respect to the trade imbalance between Canada and the U.S.S.R. could be read.

Senator Doody: Yes, senator. It is not very long.

Under the chairmanship of External Affairs, an interdepartmental task force has been set up to provide administrative guidance and market advice to Soviet trade representatives.

In addition, a full-time market researcher and a research assistant have been hired. In the last six months they have uncovered several tens of millions of dollars' worth of trade opportunities. Unfortunately, many of these opportunities have been lost because the U.S.S.R. has often been unable to quote competitive prices, deliver the goods on time, or even supply the goods.

REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, on November 5 I also asked a question with respect to immigration. I wonder when I might expect an answer to that question.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): We will certainly try to find an answer for you, senator.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the First Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages presented earlier this day.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Simard, I move, seconded by the Honourable John M. Macdonald, that the report be now adopted.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, again with respect to our routine, I think that normally we receive some sort of explanation as to why we should adopt the report. However, in this case, some half an hour or more ago we were given a copy of the report. Perhaps Senator Phillips could just refer to that report so that there is something on the record. I do not see any difficulty in supporting the motion, but I think something should be said on the record.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I would be delighted to enlighten Senator Frith. This report basically does two things: It establishes a quorum of six whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both houses, the government and the opposition are represented. The second part of the motion reduces the quorum to four to hear evidence, and again the same situation applies: In other words, both houses, the government and the opposition must be represented.

This is the normal routine motion that is made shortly after the committee begins its hearings at each session.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, this is the kind of motion that brings back certain memories. Perhaps it will refresh the memory of Senator Murray, the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

It seems to me something is missing from the conclusion of this recommendation, where it says, and I quote:

...when four members are present so long as both Houses, the government and the opposition are represented.

Nowhere does the motion mention the presence of the joint chairmen of the committee. This committee is chaired by a member of the House of Commons and a senator. There have been cases in the past when the two joint chairmen could not agree on whether or not to have a meeting, which creates some very real problems. Obviously, the joint chairmen are the servants of the committee and must abide by the rules, the instructions or the conclusions addressed to them by the committee as a whole. However, the particular case that concerns us today does not involve instructions from committee members.

What the motion seeks is instructions from both houses, which is why I rose to address the subject. What I am saying now could very well apply, in other circumstances, to other joint committees of the Senate and the House of Commons that are also jointly chaired by a member of the other place and a senator.

This is an important point.

I certainly do not object to the government and the opposition being represented, but who ultimately decides if circumstances genuinely prevent members of both houses from attending a duly scheduled meeting of a committee? Who ultimately makes that decision, when the committee is not sitting?

It seems to me that the authority to do so lies with those who were chosen by committee members, the joint chairmen, who should decide jointly whether or not a meeting will be held.

Let me give an example. When there is a vote in the House of Commons, members are called in to vote. It seems to me that in this case a member's first duty would be to respond to the division bells and not go to a committee meeting or remain there.

A member's highest duty is to go to the House on behalf of his constituents when the division bells ring, so that he can vote on the issue that has been debated.

That is a concrete example.

There might be other circumstances under which authority to convene or not convene a committee meeting would be jointly vested in both chairmen. One house should not challenge the other house within the same Parliament.

The institution has to run smoothly, and both houses should consult one another before taking action.

This is my opinion. I have known this kind of experience and in recalling this today my intention is not to dwell on the past. What is past is past, but it can be used as a lesson to avoid such a situation in the future. Besides being funny, they are breeding grounds for heated arguments which quite often lead to extreme positions.

I think Parliament cannot operate properly unless it has been duly broken in, and members of both houses must have rules which can easily and effectively be applied without generating conflicts.

So I consider that the text as drafted now is acceptable and I have no objection. All I am doing now is to point out specific and serious cases. Should one house find itself in a position such that it cannot send its members to attend a joint committee meeting, this house—through the joint chairman as authorized by his house—ought to be able to prevent the committee from holding the meeting.

This measure is required and necessary even though the opportunity to implement it may arise only very rarely. We should consider giving powers to the joint chairmen. If they cannot get together in such a case, then I suggest the meeting should be cancelled lest we might completely undermine the spirit of co-operation which should prevail in both houses of the Canadian Parliament. Thank you, honourable senators.

Senator Frith: In the light of the remarks made by our colleague Senator Corbin, honourable senators, I wonder if more thorough reflection is not required. It might be indicated to adjourn the debate for a day or two in order to try to improve the wording of the motion.

[English]

● (1540)

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I cannot resist joining in the debate. I recall I intervened in somewhat the same fashion some years ago when there was a slight argument between Senators Corbin and Murray.

The one thing that I deprecate about this report is the fact that you have to have a member of both the government and the opposition party. This is a completely non-partisan committee, as is the Regulations Committee. The Regulations Committee has been going happily since 1973 without any such requirement. The joint chairmen trust each other and they go ahead. Its main concern is to get a quorum. There is no concern as to whether the members present are all Conservatives, Liberals, or whatever. I think to put that in emphasizes a partisanship which is very unfortunate and completely unnecessary.

That is all I want to say, honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, following upon some consultations I have had through the usual channels, I would like to say a word about the business before the house.

Honourable senators will have learned, if only through the media, that there has been some considerable speculation—and recently some announcements—about the future of the Bank of British Columbia. The situation is that in order to facilitate a decision that was taken by the directors of that bank last night regarding the sale of its assets and liabilities, Parliament would have to act.

Consultations took place this morning among the Honourable Minister of Finance, the Minister of State for Finance and the Leader of the Opposition in the other place. Accordingly, my understanding is that there is now agreement among the leaders of the various parties there that there will be an order of that House providing for the waiver of various notices that would otherwise be necessary. It is also my understanding that there will be a presentation of a bill by the government this afternoon concerning the Bank of British Columbia. I do not yet have a copy, but my understanding is that the order of the House of Commons will provide that that measure will have passed that chamber by 4.45 tomorrow afternoon. If all goes as scheduled, as I understand it, we would have that bill in the Senate shortly after 4.45 tomorrow afternoon.

The question then arises as to how the Senate might attempt to facilitate this matter, and I am told that if I were to make a motion for pre-study of this bill this afternoon and possibly tomorrow morning, there would be a disposition on the part of honourable senators opposite to accept such a motion.

I may say that I expect that in the other place the debate on second reading of the bill would begin this afternoon and that there would be two or three or perhaps more speeches in that place. However, I also understand that honourable senators opposite would wish to have one of the ministers, the officials and perhaps others appear before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in the course of pre-study and I would, of course, do my best to facilitate the presence of those government witnesses before that committee.

I do not think there is anything more I can add, except to say that as soon as I have the number of the bill, and as soon as it is presented in the other place, I will ask leave to present a motion to refer the subject matter of the bill for pre-study to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I presumed that a motion for pre-study would be presented at some point after the bill is introduced in the House of Commons and after we know the precise title and number of the bill.

If the Leader of the Government wishes leave to put that motion for a pre-study, I think he will find that we will cooperate. The reason is that if we do not conduct a pre-study, at the end of the day tomorrow the Senate would have had no particular information, and the two days that are available would not have been used in getting the necessary information to deal with this particular crisis.

If that other track were followed and we received the bill and began working on it only late tomorrow, then it is quite clear that we could not deal adequately with the bill by tomorrow evening and give it Royal Assent, which I think is the intention of the government.

As the Leader of the Government has mentioned, in order to have an effective pre-study, we would like to have the Minister of Finance appear before the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. We have good reasons for asking for his appearance before that committee and, if necessary, to appear as well before the Committee of the Whole tomorrow.

I want to make it clear that we would want an appearance before that committee by the Minister of Finance. We would be unhappy if the Leader of the Government said that the Minister of State (Finance) were going to appear before the committee, because it is the Minister of Finance who has responsibility under the statute for this particular situation.

In addition to that, after consultations with the chairman of the committee, whom I informed about the possible pre-study, it was agreed we would also like to have government officials, including the Governor of the Bank of Canada, appear before that committee. In the circumstances, it seems to me appropriate also to have officials of the Bank of British Columbia, the Hong Kong Bank of Canada and the Van City Savings Bank, which put forward, as I understand it, a proposal, which failed, for a merger.

Honourable senators, I make these observations in order to facilitate the work of the Senate and to indicate what we would like, in granting leave, to have a pre-study conducted on an urgent basis.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I would like to add one thing to what has been said. In view of what I understand is a rather remarkable situation in regard to a recapitalization infusion of some $200 million by CDIC, we would wish to have before us somebody who had the authority to speak on behalf of CDIC as to the decisions that were involved in making that arrangement.

Senator Murray: As I indicated, honourable senators, I will do my best to facilitate the presence this afternoon, or tonight, or tomorrow morning, of those witnesses who are the responsibility of the Government of Canada. As for the other witnesses, that would be up to my friend, the chairman of the committee, to organize.

Senator Sinclair: Well, honourable senators, from what has been stated by the Minister of Finance in the other place, I understood that these people were in town. I wonder if the Leader of the Government would make sure that they stay here.

An Hon. Senator: It is a government bill; it is the government's responsibility.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think it is reasonable to ask the Leader of the Government not to leave the question of those banking witnesses totally to us. Certainly, the clerk of the committee will have to make the contacts, but I am sure he will help, if he can, in reaching them, because surely they are in town and they must be concerned and available.

Honourable senators, I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and Debates of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix, p. 260.)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Leblanc, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN GRAIN FARMERS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE— BASIS OF PAYMENT

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I hope that I will find the Leader of the Government in—perhaps to put it simply—better humour today and that he will try to give some information rather than drag up a lot of history that really was not very beneficial—

Senator Doody: Oh!

Senator Olson: —to the people involved. But today, on a slightly different subject—I am not sure whether the Leader of the Government can hear or not while the deputy leader is moaning in his ear—

● (1410)

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if a decision has been reached or if he can give any indication as to what will be the formula for and the method of distributing the billion-dollar farm aid package that was promised by this government two or three times and, more specifically, about five weeks ago.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my information on that subject is that very good progress has been made in a series of conferences between the Minister of Agriculture, farm leaders, provincial ministers of agriculture and their deputies. The most recent such meeting was on November 17, a week ago Monday, between the federal minister, the provincial ministers and the deputy ministers.

They have made good progress in discussing the distribution and the formulae that might be used, but the decision now rests with the Government of Canada and I expect it will be made shortly.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we appreciate the fact that a number of representatives of farm organizations were invited to the meetings where the formulae and methods of distribution were discussed, but I understand that most of those meetings were held more or less in camera.

I do not believe there has been a public announcement of the various methods that were under consideration. Therefore, the people who are to be the recipients of this program have no idea what the government intends to do or, indeed, what recommendations were made by some of the farm organizations.

Surely, before a final decision is made, there should be enough public awareness of what was under consideration so that those who are directly affected can have something to say about it.

I ask the Leader of the Government whether the moneys will be distributed on the basis of acreage, previous production of tonnage, or whatever.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator has mentioned some of the considerations that were discussed by provincial and federal officials and by the representatives of the farm organizations.

There was some suggestion that the system ought to be based on acreage or some combination of production value and seeded acreage. There was also a question of whether the entitlement ought to be based on the decline in the value of the 1986 crop that would be attributable to the U.S. farm bill. There was discussion about what constitutes a region and what should be the most suitable base.

The honourable senator will appreciate that all these are complex matters and give rise to quite different perspectives on the part of the different organizations that were represented. As I say, all possibilities and all points of view were canvassed in the course of those meetings. It now rests squarely with the Government of Canada to decide on a formula and to announce it. This we will do in the very near future.

Senator Olson: May we have a more precise definition of the meaning of "the near future"?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not have this statement in front of me, but my recollection is that the Minister of Agriculture said some time ago that a decision would be announced before Christmas.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. According to the minister's statement, production was one of the factors to be considered. Would the minister be able to clarify whether that would be the actual production that came from a given unit through the Wheat Board permit system, or another marketing mechanism, or whether it would be the potential or normal production that comes from a particular unit of land based on, for example, crop insurance records? My concern is lest the farmers whom I represent should be penalized because they happen to have had a number of crop failures due to drought over the past few years. This is an important question, I think, because if one of the factors is the production based on crop insurance records, then I think that that is reasonably fair. However, if the production factor is based on whether or not it rained, then it would be most unfair.

Secondly—and I remember asking the minister about this some time ago—has there been discussion about the principle of a limit on the amount that is paid to an individual farmer so that if acreage is taken into account it is not entirely open ended, resulting in a 20-section farmer getting 20 times as much as a one-section farmer? I really believed that there should be a cut-off.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I appreciate the importance of the questions and of the representations that have just been made by the honourable senator, but I simply do not have that information with me today.

Senator Argue: Perhaps the minister could get that information.

GRAIN

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—ALLOCATION OF PAYMENTS

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, the chairman of the Canadian Wheat Board, Mr. Jarvis, when speaking at the UGG annual convention and also at the Wheat Pools' annual meetings, has stated that there will not likely be a final payment on last year's crop, even though in the individual Wheat Pool accounts for higher quality wheat there was a substantial surplus. That surplus, however, because of the way the bookkeeping is done, will be withheld from those farmers to whom it would normally be paid because the lower grades cause a deficit and that deficit will be subtracted from the surplus in the higher grades. This may sound a little complicated. For the benefit of honourable senators and by way of example, about ten years ago, when a Liberal government was in office, this very thing happened; namely, there was a substantial surplus coming to the durum wheat producers because that wheat sold at a high price. Spring wheat sold at a deficit. The law of the land at that time maintained that the deficit in the spring wheat account would be deducted from the surplus of the durum wheat producers. The durum wheat producers objected, the government brought in amendments and the durum wheat producers received their money.

My more specific question is: Would the minister make the necessary inquiries to find out whether the present administration is prepared to follow the same principle; namely, to see that the pay-out is divided on the basis of individual accounts and that, where a surplus has accrued to the producers of high quality wheat, those producers will be paid? What this means in my country is that the farmer who grew high quality wheat but only harvested a small quantity because of the drought will receive no money at all because someone else farmed low grade wheat and the Wheat Board had to sell it on the market at less than the initial price.

I consider this to be a very important principle and, unless the injustice is corrected, farmers stand to lose hundreds of millions of dollars that are rightfully theirs.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, with the possible exception of Alvin Hamilton, I do not know of anyone who can incorporate the whole history of modern agriculture into the premise to a single question. I will ask the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, the Honourable Charles Mayer, to clarify the points raised by the honourable senator, and I will endeavour to bring in a report within a day or two.

Senator Argue: I hope that the Leader of the Government will do more than clarify the law as it stands. Is he prepared to correct the injustice in the law that is denying wheat producers the amount of money that is theirs, based on world prices and the amount that went into their accounts for their wheat that was sold?

Senator Murray: I will see that those representations are brought to the attention of the minister. I am sure that he will address them in the report that he gives me to bring to the Senate.

COMMUNICATIONS

PROPOSED SALE OF TELEGLOBE

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government some questions concerning Teleglobe. I understand that on November 20 a press conference was held to provide in-depth briefing for some possible purchasers of the Teleglobe interest from the Government of Canada. In a newspaper report it is stated that the government has given domestic companies until December 29 to inform the government whether they are interested in pursuing the offer. It also states that the government intends to make a decision early in the new year and that:

... non-telephone company bidders will be notified about the phone companies' plans and will have until Jan. 9, 1987, to adjust their bids accordingly and submit them to the Government.

I should like to ask the government leader why the haste and when the bill will appear so that we can study it.

I would also ask the government leader why Miss MacDonald, the Minister of Communications, believes that allowing the telephone companies an interest of 40 per cent would not be a controlling interest in Teleglobe?

Senator Austin: As a supplementary, would the Leader of the Government also ask why it seems to be government policy to limit the public interest in Teleglobe to only 15 per cent? That is also part of the government's policy as disclosed by the Honourable Miss MacDonald. I wonder just why the government would not, as the British government has been so successful in doing, make these equity positions available to Canadians as a whole rather than to a very few corporations.

I might add that it should be an attractive offer if the allowable rate of return, as contained in the press release, on equity for Teleglobe's new owners will be between 13 per cent and 15 per cent as a result of a special formula. Why reserve 40 per cent for the telephone companies and another 45 per cent for very large corporate bidders?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I wonder if Prime Minister Thatcher realizes the support she is getting from such an unlikely source. In any case, I shall do my best to bring in a reply to the question the honourable senator has raised. I do think that it would be more appropriate to raise the question with the responsible minister before a Senate committee when it is either considering or pre-studying the bill.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF CHURCHILL, MANITOBA—MAINTENANCE OF FACILITIES AND TRANSPORTATION OF GRAIN TO PORT

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is in reference to the Port of Churchill, about which many references are made, come spring, a time when it is often too late to do anything about such representations. Therefore, I feel that I should make my comments now and ask the leader to make representations on our behalf to cabinet and to the appropriate minister. Perhaps in that way we can ensure that the Port of Churchill will not deteriorate this winter because of a lack of heating facilities, merely to save a few dollars. It will cost a lot more money to repair such damage when the spring comes.

The year 1986 was a very successful one for the Port of Churchill, notwithstanding the fact that CNR could not provide freight cars during the strike in Thunder Bay. If CN could have provided cars, the port could possibly have processed another 200,000 tonnes in addition to the 600,000 tonnes that were shipped. This would have been favourable and advantageous to farmers in Saskatchewan as well as to those in Manitoba, because the costs of shipping through the Port of Churchill are definitely lower, and I can produce documents to support this fact. I ask the Leader of the Government to make representations on our behalf to the government to encourage CNR to provide more freight cars for the 1987 season and, at the same time, to give consideration to the possibility of trucking grain to Churchill, which now has a good highway that could handle the traffic, and, as I mentioned before, to consider the possibility of keeping the facilities there heated through the winter to avoid deterioration of the port. At the same time, such action would provide employment for a lot of people in Churchill over the winter, thereby keeping them off welfare.

I plead with the leader to make these representations because they are necessary requirements, not only for the Port of Churchill, not only for the farmers and grain producers but also for the people in the far north who have their heating supplies and other needs delivered by rail to Churchill.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall see that the representations of Senator Guay are made known to the minister who reports to Parliament for Canadian National Railway, and I shall ask that minister to convey to honourable senators any immediate comments he may have on those representations.

INDUSTRY

NOVA SCOTIA—POSSIBLE MANUFACTURE AND EXPORT OF ARMAMENTS BY WEST GERMAN COMPANY FROM PROPOSED PLANT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government with respect to comments made by the Minister of Supply and Services, who stated that there were still prospects for the location of a Thyssen branch or an offshoot of the Thyssen plant in Nova Scotia. The honourable minister may recall that some time ago there was considerable news comment about negotiations that were alleged to be taking place between the Government of Canada and Thyssen to locate a subsidiary plant in Nova Scotia in the Strait of Canso. That plant would sell armaments, munitions or some form of military hardware to the Middle East. In view of the Honourable Stewart McInnes's comments, I wonder if the Leader of the Government could throw any light on that situation, and particularly on whether there is any real prospect that such a plant will be located there and whether negotiations are continuing.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do recall the history recounted by the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition, but, I must confess, I have not seen the statement attributed to the Minister of Public Works. Nor do I have any new information on the subject. I shall make inquiries and report back to the house.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I wonder if in making the inquiries the minister could deal with the question of whether the Department of External Affairs has considered the question of sales of such material to the Middle East and whether it has made a decision that such sales would be acceptable.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I shall do that.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

FIRST REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Simard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, for the adoption of the First Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages (Quorum of the Committee), presented in the Senate on 25th November, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I said what I wanted to say on the subject yesterday. I really have nothing further to add. I thought that it was timely for us to ponder the consequences of what I see as an omission in an order that this house is prepared to approve in the sense that I find the text incomplete inasmuch as it does not address itself to the powers vested in the co-chairmen of joint committees. That question has never been addressed. It has been debated in times of crises, but times of crises are bad times to put together regulations or to establish precedents. Now that we are being asked to approve a text which binds, practically forever, both houses with respect to the orderly running of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, I think that now is the time for us to examine in more detail what could well happen and, in fact, what has happened in the past when one or the other of the co-chairmen did not or could not agree jointly to the holding of a meeting of a committee. That is a real problem. It does not occur very often, but when it does occur it can be the object of a great deal of recrimination.

I have heard in the halls of this noble institution today that there may well be a disposition to refer this whole matter to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders in order that the text might be examined and note taken of some of the observations I made yesterday and today. I certainly would not want to stand in the way of a move in that direction. In fact, I think there would be a lot of merit in having the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders examine the question in greater detail, because the final outcome is, as I am sure honourable senators will agree, the better functioning of the institution of Parliament itself. That is, to put in place mechanisms which allow the Senate and the House of Commons to proceed under very simple ground rules in times of stress—and I use that word advisedly.

Yesterday I believe Senator Godfrey said that there are a couple of committees here on the hill which, by their very nature, are non-partisan. Senator Godfrey is nodding his head; I believe that those were the terms he used yesterday. Honourable senators, in my book there is no such thing as non-partisanship within the institution of Parliament. The very nature of this place is debate. I am not saying that it must be either deeply-coloured or lightly-tinted, but the very nature of the beast says it all. This is a place for debate; this is a place for contrary views, but it is also a place for compromise and consensus.

We have today in front of us an item. As small and picayune as it may appear at first glance, it is an item that warrants our attention so that in the future we do not need to live with distasteful situations such as those that we have experienced in the past in so-called non-partisan joint committees of Parliament.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, first of all I would like to make one comment. Yesterday when I said "non-partisan," I did not mean that there was no debate. On the contrary, there has been lots of debate in the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. However, the distinction between partisan and non-partisan is whether the debate is along party lines. In the Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments Committee, we have never had a debate along party lines. In fact, we have only ever had one vote. We have always operated by consensus. Therefore, there is a great deal of distinction between debates that are partisan and debates that are non-partisan.

I would simply ask the honourable senator whether or not he has any objection to approving this report, and in the meantime we can have the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders consider the matter. Of course, if in the meantime a crisis comes up, then we have a crisis, but I am sure the honourable senator is not suggesting that we should hold up approval of this report and thus prevent the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages from meeting until a decision has been reached by the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, if Senator Godfrey is asking me a question, I suppose I should respond to it. The answer is no, of course I am not about to hold up the work of Parliament, and certainly not the excellent work of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages and, incidentally, Senator Godfrey's committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. I am simply saying that we should deal with this issue once and for all.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I agree that there are some real difficulties, it seems to me, from a practical point of view in putting into the form of a rule a procedure whereby a committee itself decides by writ that, for example, there must be representation from both parties before that committee can operate. I can understand in most cases a committee deciding on a discretionary basis that it will not proceed unless that is so. However, if it is a matter of writ, that means that a committee cannot proceed at all unless both parties are represented. That, in turn, gives a party in Parliament the opportunity to block progress, for example, of the study of a bill by one party's members simply by not showing up at that committee. By the simple device of the whip telling his or her members not to show, the whole legislative procedure grinds to a halt.

Therefore, I hope that the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders will, of its own motion, as it is entitled to do under the rules, look at this question. In the meantime, I am not disposed to hold up something that this joint committee wants. This is Senator Simard's proposal. But I think we should not let the matter go by without taking a look at it, because I can see some real difficulties in making such a provision as compared to a discretionary and traditional agreement that in most cases a committee does not proceed unless all parties are represented.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it agreed that we proceed in the fashion that has been put forward by Senator Frith?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE ALLIANCE NATIONALE CONSOLIDATED ACT, 1945

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Second Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs presented on Tuesday, November 25, 1986.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, for the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, that the report be now adopted.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, on behalf of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Does the sponsor of a private bill not have to move third reading?

Senator Doody: If so, I move, on behalf of the Honourable Senator Cogger, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Frith: I may be mistaken but, as I said, I think the sponsor of a private bill must move that it be given third reading.

The order for consideration is standing in the name of Senator Nurgitz because he presented the report as Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

If I am right, let the record show that the sponsor has moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Michel Cogger: I so move, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Cogger, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, for an Address to Her Excellency the Governor General in reply to Her Speech at the opening of the Session.—(Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.). (8th and final day of resuming debate).

Hon. H.A. Olson: I yield to Senator Graham.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I want to begin by congratulating all of those who have preceded me in this debate. They have been thoughtful, sometimes partisan, but always eloquent in their respective presentations. I also want to welcome all of the new senators, some of whom are comparative veterans at this particular point in time. I am thinking of Senators Cogger and Atkins who, with their considerable skills in the private and political life of this country, will add both influence and lustre to the Senate. I also want to congratulate those senators who were appointed yesterday, Senator Cochrane from Newfoundland, Senator Rossiter from Prince Edward Island and Senator Spivak from Manitoba. I am sure that they, too, will contribute greatly not only to the beauty and charm of this chamber but to the quality of our debates and committee proceedings.

I would be remiss if I did not publicly congratulate my long-time friend, Senator Murray, although he is not in the chamber at the present time. He has taken on the awesome duties of Leader of the Government in the Senate and the very challenging responsibilities of Minister of State responsible for Federal-Provincial Relations.

I speak to you almost on the eve of great celebrations on Cape Breton Island, and at a time when my part of Canada is suffering from high unemployment and industrial uncertainty. First, I want to deal with the good news, and that is that I am happy to report that preparations for Jeux Canada Games '87, to be held in Cape Breton, in that most beautiful part of Canada, are well on schedule and running smoothly.

The Municipality of the County of Cape Breton, along with other municipalities, towns and my home city of Sydney, will host the sixth, the largest, and what promises to be the best, Winter Games at various points on the Island from February 14 to 28. During that period Canada will be treated to excellence in athletic competition as our finest young athletes compete in 17 different sports.

For the first time in history, a national cultural program will be staged in conjunction with the Winter Games. Entertainers from all over the country will perform in a giant two-week cultural festival, giving all games participants and spectators the opportunity to experience first hand a little of Canada's colourful and diverse heritage. I am told it will be multiculturalism at its best. On a local note, honourable senators, without any pun intended, a new pipe band has been organized to be known as the Games Pipe Band of 1987.

I am reminded, too, of the enormous contribution that has been made to this event by two of our colleagues in the Senate. I am thinking of Senator Ray Perrault who, at the time of the awarding of the games, was Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport. He contributed greatly to the organization of the games at that particular time. I am sure that he will be an interested spectator at the games in 1987. I am also thinking of Senator MacEachen who has made such a significant contribution in so many ways to that part of Canada.

At any rate, honourable senators, we look forward to welcoming you all to Cape Breton and, indeed, to Nova Scotia for that great event. I can assure you of genuine hospitality and personal attention. I am sure that in saying this I can speak on behalf of Senator MacEachen, Senator John M. Macdonald, Senator Muir, Senator Murray and, speaking of Senator Murray, that other estimable transplant from Cape Breton, Senator Finlay MacDonald. Some 5,000 volunteers have been lined up to ensure both the success of the games and the pleasure of your stay. At any rate, honourable senators, I am at your disposal to provide any further information in that respect.

It is always painful for me to note that the economy of my part of Canada is in a dreadful state. Official unemployment rates are running at over 20 per cent. Unofficially it is much higher, running above 50 per cent in some specific locations on Cape Breton Island. The federal government initiatives over the past two years, however well intentioned, have not yet shown positive results. A new proposal, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Program, was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, but so far it has been difficult to determine what form it will take, how it will be funded and what ministry will ultimately be responsible for that particular undertaking.

I can only hope that there will be adequate consultation with those most directly concerned—that is, the people of Atlantic Canada—and that that agency will not be encumbered in the kind of bureaucratic strait-jacket which I am told has greatly hindered the efforts of people associated with Enterprise Cape Breton.

But I come to the the most serious and pressing need, and that is the future of Sydney Steel. The first phase of modernization, costing in the vicinity of $96 million—80 per cent paid by Canada and 20 per cent paid by Nova Scotia—was completed approximately two years ago. The commitment at that time was that if the first phase went well, then the second phase would be almost automatic, given the usual negotiations between both levels of government.

Since 1984 several announcements have been made by both Nova Scotia and Ottawa that the second phase was about to get under way. The cost would be of the order of $157 million, this time 70 per cent paid by Canada and 30 per cent paid by Nova Scotia. An extensive market study was undertaken last November by the A.D. Little Co. of Boston and Toronto. Two months ago the first contract of the second phase was awarded. It has to do with detailed design engineering. But three weeks ago we were told that the future of the plant is in jeopardy, and will depend largely on the results of a new market analysis—an updating by the A.D. Little Co. This, of course, has caused a great deal of anxiety and uncertainty in the local community.

Honourable senators, I want to emphasize that the first phase—the $96 million expenditure—was designed to rebuild one blast furnace and provide extensive renovations to the existing bloom and rail-finishing mills. That was really what you might call a shoring-up operation to secure the existing facilities, and it went very well. But the real potential for cost reduction and efficiency lies in the completion of the second phase. In addition, it will enable Sysco to produce so-called "head-hardened rails"—something it is unable to do now. More and more railways, of course, are seeking that type of top quality product, which is now only available from foreign countries.

I recognize that it is a very competitive world out there. The management and workers at Sysco have done a remarkable job of competing with what they have, but if we do not give them the necessary tools through Phase II, the plant does not stand a chance of surviving. Over the past 75 years Sysco has established an international reputation for supplying quality rails. Sysco can build on that international reputation if we help make the plant cost competitive. But here at home, there must be closer co-operation between the two crown corporations—CN and Sysco. The Government of Canada should ensure that CN's long-term needs are clearly understood and enunciated well in advance, and that Sysco—as had been a time honoured tradition until recently—is the sole supplier to meet CN's future requirements.

Let me say that Sysco is vitally important not just to Cape Breton and Nova Scotia but to the economy of the whole of the Atlantic provinces. Its future raises the fundamental question in my mind of whether regional economies will be allowed to grow. Part of the rationale for providing assistance is the necessity for a strong steel industry as an engine of economic growth in the various regions of the country. I hope that all honourable senators will join in impressing upon the government the urgent need for yet another, and this time irrevocable, commitment to Sysco Phase II.

I want to say a word about the importance of the forest industry to our country. Let me begin by saying that it is time, indeed it is long past time in my judgment, for Canada to have a federal department of forestry at full departmental level. I do not make that suggestion solely on the basis of the recent difficulties pertaining to softwood exports. It is an accepted fact that Canada is the world's leading exporter of pulp and paper products and the world's second largest pulp and paper manufacturer. For many years now, export sales of forest products have been highly concentrated in a few market areas, with the United States currently accounting for about 72 per cent of exports. The European Economic Community with 12 per cent, and Japan with 6 per cent, make up the bulk of the remaining sales.

The recent trade disputes with the United States illustrate clearly that this country is particularly vulnerable to the imposition of protectionist measures. Steps must be taken to ensure uninterrupted access to Canada's primary markets.

I want to emphasize that from a socio-economic point of view Canada's forests are its most valuable natural resource. Not only does the sector contribute some $28 billion annually to gross domestic product and generate $3 billion in tax revenue, it is also Canada's largest employer, accounting for one out of every ten individuals employed in our country. Direct employment in logging, pulp, paper and allied industries totals approximately 350,000. On top of this, each direct job has a spin-off effect of two additional jobs in other economic sectors. Therefore, close to one million jobs in Canada are attributable directly or indirectly to the forest industry. Moreover, the net trade surplus from forestry exports is, at $13 billion, more than the combined net export revenues of agriculture, fisheries, mining and coal.

Even though statistics might suggest that the forestry sector is in excellent shape, major problems do exist. One of the first and foremost difficulties surrounds the rapid depletion of the available wood supply, particularly softwoods. According to Canadian forestry service calculations, this country is losing 1 per cent of its available forestry resource each year as a result of inadequate forest management, because of fire, insect kill and disease. Unfortunately, this trend shows no sign of abating. There is therefore a tremendous need to restrict such harmful losses through the application of proper forest management techniques. Failure to deal with potential serious shortfalls of timber now may lead eventually to increased unemployment in the forest sector as well as to a future loss of government revenue.

Connected with this is the need to restock satisfactorily the 26 million hectares of forest land—which is about 12 per cent of the total in Canada—currently understocked or carrying only brush species. Canada's comparatively poor record of reforestation, coupled with the foresight of competing countries such as Sweden, Norway and Finland, explains to a significant extent why Canada has lost its once dominant position in world markets.

It should be noted that severe competition from countries where trees grow much faster along with protectionist measures have also helped accelerate the decline in Canada's world market share for forest products.

Moreover, local shortages of commercially suitable wood have developed in every province in recent years. Much of the apparent reserve wood supply cannot be used for conventional forest products because it is in remote areas, on difficult terrain, or comprises overmature stock, defective trees and less desirable species of little commercial value.

At the present time the federal government's forestry-related activities are co-ordinated by the Minister of State for Forestry and Mines. The establishment of this ministry of state in September of 1984 gave the forestry sector cabinet rank and status for the first time in many years. At the same time, however, the ministry of state is positioned in the organizational structure of the government as merely an adjunct to the Department of Agriculture. As such, it carries a lesser organizational status, and, I believe, less importance, less clout, if you will, than it would have if it were given full departmental status.

Within the Ministry of State for Forestry and Mines, the vehicle for delivering government programs and funds—this is by way of explanation—in the areas of forestry research and development is the Canadian Forestry Service. This organization has a budget of approximately $218 million and a person-year level of 1,255. It was transferred from the Department of the Environment to Agriculture Canada in October of 1984. The Canadian Forestry Service, as the federal focus for forestry activities, fulfils the federal government's responsibility for the protection, management and utilization of Canada's forest resource. Programs engaged in by the Canadian Forestry Service are carried out in close co-operation with a variety of jurisdictions within the federal government. For instance, federal involvement in forest renewal is demonstrated through expenditures committed under its regional economic expansion initiatives and through the allocation of funds to support job creation efforts in the area of forest renewal.

As far back as 1960, unanimous support was given to the creation of a full department of forestry by the House of Commons, and many similar recommendations have been made since that time. For instance, the Standing Committee on Environment and Forestry in the other place in its first report in June of 1986 entitled "Forest Resources and Industries in Eastern Canada," in recommendation 27, stated:

• (1500)

The government should consider the creation of a federal department of forestry in the near future.

This recommendation was based on testimony presented to the committee by interested groups in eastern Canada.

I should also like to refer to a statement by the Science Council of Canada entitled "Canada's Threatened Forests" of March 1983 where it states:

Approval of concepts and strategies are important, but it is more important that they are implemented. The House of Commons unanimously supported a full department of forestry as long ago as 1960. This has been recommended repeatedly to the federal government since then. Given the critical condition of the forest resource and the importance of the forest sector in the national economy, the arguments of 20 years ago are even more persuasive today. A reconstituted department under a full time minister could integrate regional economic development and employment creation potential with a broader and more-balanced program of support for scientific forest management, research and applications of research results.

Thus, the Science Council of Canada endorses the recommendation of the federal government that the status of forestry be upgraded with a federal ministry of its own.

Finally, in that connection, a resolution of the Canadian Institute of Forestry was passed at its 1986 annual meeting held September 22 to 25, 1986 when it was resolved that the Canadian Institute of Forestry should urge the Government of Canada to establish forestry in the cabinet at full departmental level.

Honourable senators, I am confident that such a move would serve to give a full-time minister with full departmental status greater clout at the cabinet table, much stronger influence and a much stronger voice when it comes to dealing with related problems on the international scene.

[Senator Graham.]

Before I conclude, I want to say just a few words with respect to the situation in the Philippines.

The international delegation which observed the federal presidential election last February concluded that the election was not conducted in a free and fair manner. As some of you know, I was a member of that delegation. It was our belief that the former government of Ferdinand Marcos and the Commission on Elections bore the responsibility for that failure. Our conclusions of that time have never changed.

Honourable members will remember that after returning from the Philippines I stated in my report:

The story of an attempt to corrupt the electoral process and the ultimate expression of a democratic people, is one of great importance to those who seek and wish to preserve democratic futures for their own nations. Tribute must be paid to what may have been the finest example of "people power" in the history of the world. It was dramatically evidenced by mothers and fathers, brothers and sisters, priests and nuns who protected ballot boxes with their lives and turned back tanks and armed soldiers through sheer determination, raw courage and incredible bravery. They felt that for their generation it was now or never.

As honourable senators know, the domestic situation in the Philippines today is charged with uncertainty and, at times, with violence.

President Aquino is personally popular. Her courage and integrity are symbols of hope for the vast majority of the 55 million inhabitants of that beautiful country. In my judgment, she is the best hope for the present and, indeed, for the immediate future.

Many factors preoccupying the government's program of rejuvenation are the continuing matter of the insurgency, political manoeuvring leading to the congressional elections which will be held in May of 1987, and the economy.

Canada has an important role to play. I want to congratulate the federal government on its recent announcements with respect to a full-range development assistance program amounting to a pledge of $100 million over the next five years. I understand that this assistance is designed to support the work of voluntary groups in the Philippines, government-supported projects, as well as Canadian commercial activities and joint ventures.

I want to emphasize that it is especially important that the Government of the Philippines receives moral and actual support from friendly nations. Particularly on the economic front, it is essential that Filipinos recognize that the new government is able to attract economic and financial support and is given the means to improve the well-being of individuals and the nation generally. That is essential if the government of Corason Aquino is to continue to receive the goodwill and support of the Philippine people. Any perception that the government is not successful in this regard can only serve to weaken its position and further fracture the current political coalition. The resultant instability, undesirable in itself, would strengthen the position of Marcos loyalists and those who would prefer a return to autocratic and elitist government.

In many respects there is a chicken and egg factor with respect to outside financial investment in the Philippines. On the one hand, Filipinos are waiting for the outside world, particularly as it relates to corporate and private investors, to demonstrate confidence in the stability of the Aquino government. On the other hand, potential outside investors are waiting for the people of the Philippines to stabilize their own situation before embarking on multi-million-dollar risks on behalf of their shareholders. So, the chicken and egg situation produces a form of paralysis.

Honourable senators, I am not an expert on the Philippines. I do not have an answer, but I do know that if the logjam with respect to outside investment in the Philippines is not broken, 70 per cent of the 55 million people in that part of the world will continue to live in abject poverty and all of them will live in an atmosphere of fear and uncertainty.

Those of us in a free, comparatively healthy society must decide whether it is worth some further major risks in attempting to relieve the suffering of people who deserve a far better break, and some of the comfort and security that those of us in the comfortable pew take for granted.

When the time is appropriate and, let us hope, in the not too distant future, it would be welcome news for all of us if President Aquino were to visit Canada so that we could demonstrate in a very public way our admiration and support for her example, her efforts and her accomplishments in promoting freedom and democracy not just in the Philippines but around the world.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I welcome this opportunity to join my colleagues on both sides of the chamber in the debate on the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I offer my congratulations to both the mover and seconder of the motion and, as well, to other honourable senators on both sides of the chamber who have made their very constructive contribution to this debate.

The Speech from the Throne provided a preview of the new Parliamentary session and highlighted the government's record since its mandate of September 1984.

The Throne Speech had four main themes: Economic renewal; social justice; national reconciliation; and a constructive role for Canada in world affairs.

There has been a significant improvement in the Canadian economy over the last two years, notwithstanding serious problems in western Canada in both the agricultural and energy sectors. Average incomes for Canadian families rose in 1985 for the first time in five years and many more Canadians are working. The unemployment rate is down two full percentage points since September 1984.

However, the government recognizes that much more remains to be done, and the Throne Speech identified some major initiatives designed to help continue the improvement.

Tax reform is high on the agenda, as the Minister of Finance works on ways and means to distribute the tax burden more fairly through a simpler tax system and lower personal tax rates. International trade is a vital part of Canada's future, and the new GATT round of global trade talks and our on-going discussions with the United States aim to secure and increase access to our trading markets. I will have more to say on the subject later in my remarks. New regional development initiatives were also announced, including the creation of a new Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency in Moncton and a commitment to encourage economic diversification in western Canada.

Following the Throne Speech, the Prime Minister announced a $1 billion aid package for western grain farmers in an attempt to provide relief from a grain price collapse resulting from the vicious trade war being carried on between the European Community and the United States.

Science and technology have been identified as cornerstones of the government's long-term economic plan. The Throne Speech cited the establishment of the Canadian space agency and the formation of a new national advisory board on industrial technology composed of leading Canadian scientists and industrialists. Social justice, a major theme of the government's Throne Speech, has been given renewed emphasis, and special initiatives were outlined which will help defend and strengthen the institution of the Canadian family. Protection of the environment has also been identified as a top priority. A new environmental protection act will be introduced to deal with pollution, and the focus will be on toxic chemicals and improving water quality.

Cooperation between the provinces and the federal government has improved greatly in the last two years. High priority will be given to the unanswered questions of national reconciliation, such as Quebec signing the Constitution and the inclusion of aboriginal rights in the Constitution.

Let me return briefly to the subject of international trade. The Throne Speech re-affirms the government's resolve to open and secure new markets for Canada everywhere in the world. These efforts include bilateral talks with the United States and multilateral negotiations under the auspices of GATT. Economic renewal depends on improving Canada's status as a trading nation among our major partners, with particular emphasis on trade with Japan and other Pacific Rim nations.

Trade promotion, however vigorous, cannot, however, succeed if world markets important to Canadian exporters are threatened by increased global protectionism. By becoming a more successful world trader, we will strengthen not only our economy but also our capacity to reinforce our culture, our sovereignty, our commitment to regional development and our social policies. These characteristics define Canada and the essential features of our national identity.

Canada supports the new multilateral trade negotiations under GATT as an opportunity to find solutions to the problems facing the international trading community.

This government recognizes the urgency and importance of fighting protectionism in the international marketplace. We seek a fairer and freer global trading environment because our prosperity depends largely on our ability to secure global markets and on our ability to open up new ones. As the Prime Minister's trade missions to Japan, China and Korea clearly established, this government is not putting all of its trading eggs in one basket. If those markets grow, Canada grows. If those markets shrink, Canada's prosperity diminishes.

The issue of international agricultural trade is an important one for the government. Last May the Prime Minister placed agriculture on the agenda at the Economic Summit in Tokyo, and just recently in concert with our global trading partners we secured unanimous agreement to address the question of farm subsidies in the new GATT round.

This is a difficult period for international trade and we would be foolish not to recognize that vital markets for Canada are in peril. Each day it becomes more difficult to defend our interests in and our access to American markets.

There is a door of protectionism that is closing on us, and I for one do not believe that this is a problem that will go away when the current election fever in the United States subsides. That, of course, is why the government has embarked upon talks which could lead to an historic liberalized trading agreement between the United States and ourselves. Whether or not we will succeed in getting a new deal with the Americans that will have the effect of shielding our trade from shifting political winds and will protect Canada from the vast arsenal of regulatory and legal weapons that can be used to restrict our trade remains to be seen. One thing is certain, however—we will certainly never obtain such an agreement if we do not sit down at the table with the Americans and attempt to negotiate it.

Honourable senators, it is a fair question, I suggest, to ask the members of the Liberal Party in this chamber where the opposition stands on the question of bilateral negotiations with the Americans intended to lead to a freer trade environment between our two countries. Each passing day adds another page of confusion to the Liberal Party trade policy. As Martin Cohen of the Toronto Star notes, there seem to be four Liberal positions on free trade.

Donald Johnston is gung ho for negotiations; Mr. Axworthy calls for a moratorium; Mr. Gray is flat out opposed, and then there is Mr. Turner. As Leader of the Opposition, he opposed the start of the negotiations and he now appears to oppose a halt to the negotiations. The best Mr. Axworthy can offer to explain the confusion and inconsistency within the Liberal Party on this question is to say:

I think it can be explained by saying that we were using differing words to say essentially the same thing.

He then added,

[Senator Balfour.]

This is a moveable feast.

Then former Liberal environment minister Charles Caccia made his contribution in the House of Commons on October 27 when he said:

We do not believe that it would be in Canada's best interest to engage in a negotiation on a one-to-one basis between us, a fairly small economy, and the Americans, a very large and powerful economy.

It is obvious from the remarks of Axworthy, Gray, Caccia and others that Mr. Turner cannot control his caucus and that the Liberals have a different trade policy for each day of the week.

Geoffrey Simpson of the Globe and Mail summed it up very well when he wrote:

The Liberals' manifest confusion over free trade is but one example of a wider malaise. On social policy the party remains unwilling to countenance any movement away from the big spending and occasionally counterproductive programs of the past.

Honourable senators, the trade negotiations with the United States being carried on at the present time have the potential to be the single most significant political initiative taken by this country in the past 20 years. According to the Economic Council of Canada, freer trade with the United States would boost economic growth dramatically in Canada, but the other side of the coin is that protectionism, if allowed to flourish, could result in hundreds of thousands of lost Canadian jobs in the next ten years.

In its twenty-third annual review of the economy released on October 20, 1986, the council presented the results of its economic simulations of freer trade with the United States. According to the council, freer trade would result in increased output in all industrial sectors, primary, manufacturing and services. About 120,000 new jobs would be created by 1991 if tariff and some non-tariff trade barriers with the United States were dropped by 1987. This total could rise to 200,000 jobs by 1995. However, about 520,000 Canadian jobs would be lost in net terms by 1995 if the United States were to impose a 20 per cent surcharge on most imported manufactured goods and its trading partners, including Canada, retaliated.

According to the council, the biggest advantage of a policy of freer trade is that it is based on growth, and it is economic growth that will create the jobs sought by those who have to change jobs and by those entering the labour market for the first time.

Members of the government have striven over the last two years to address the aspirations and expectations of all Canadians. The Speech from the Throne re-emphasizes the government's commitment to continue along that course. The pursuit and even partial accomplishment of these worthy objectives will ensure a better Canada for all Canadians now and in the future.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I am pleased to follow Senator Balfour of Regina because, in terms of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, this makes something of a Saskatchewan day. Taken with Senator Graham's comment, I suppose this is also a day for the regions of this country.

I want to add my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the motion for an Address in reply, for the arguments they made—although I cannot, of course, be expected to agree with all of them—and for the information they put forward.

• (1520)

I was delighted to be in the Senate yesterday when we welcomed three new women senators to this chamber. I wish to congratulate Senator Spivak of Manitoba, Senator Rossiter of Prince Edward Island and Senator Cochrane of Newfoundland on their appointment. I am sure that we all look forward to the contributions which each of them will be making in this chamber in the years ahead.

I was unable to be present in the chamber in July when tributes were paid to the late Senator Yuzyk, and, with the indulgence of the Senate, I would like at this time to make a few remarks about my late good friend.

I knew Senator Yuzyk both when he was in the Senate and before. He was born and educated in Saskatchewan, became a professor at the University of Manitoba, and was appointed to the Senate from Manitoba. For a number of years I worked closely with him on the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture. I had the honour of being the chairman and Senator Yuzyk was deputy chairman. He performed his duties in an exemplary manner and I believe that we all learned from Senator Yuzyk's contribution. The work of the Senate was very high in his priorities, as was his love for and service to Canada and his concern for human rights and ethnic minorities.

Senator Yuzyk made both a Canadian and international contribution. I believe he was a loyal member of the Conservative Party, but at times he did not necessarily follow the party line if, by conviction, he felt that another point of view should be put forward. In addition—and this has not been mentioned—he was instrumental—I believe he was the leader—in establishing in Florida, in the area in which he had a residence—namely, North Port, Florida—an ecumenical church, owned and occupied by the Ukrainian Catholic community and the Ukrainian Orthodox community. His ecumenical example was most commendable.

In addition, Senator Yuzyk was a leader in providing credit union facilities within that church so that citizens, members of both congregations, could cash their cheques easily and at their convenience. That, too, I considered most commendable.

Senator Yuzyk and I worked together in many fields and had many interests in common. His wife Mary and my wife Jean are very close friends. He took a great interest in health matters, in preventive and alternative medicine. He felt that in addition to drugs and surgery, much was to be gained from nutritional practices, from the use of organic foods, vitamins, and so on. He showed leadership in many ways. All Canada is the better for the great work of Senator Yuzyk. I thought of Senator Yuzyk when I read an article in this morning's Globe and Mail which stated that as a result of a survey it was found that the affliction of cataracts, from which aged people suffer, had been reduced to 44 per cent as a result of a small supplement each day of vitamin E, and to 30 per cent as a result of a small supplement of vitamin C.

That survey is of major importance and indicates that in the health field we have a great deal to learn. Much pioneering work is being done and perhaps we can come to grips with the astronomical and ever-accelerating cost of medical and hospital services in this country by looking at alternative methods and encouraging preventive medicine. By doing so, we might become healthier Canadians, and at lower cost through successful therapies developed in addition to drug-taking, surgery and hospitalization.

During my remarks, I am sure that honourable senators would expect me to say something about the economic situation in western Canada, and particularly the serious situation with respect to agriculture in western Canada, and, indeed, all across Canada. Superimposed upon a very serious crisis in western agriculture has been, of course, the current downturn in the energy industry as it affects Saskatchewan, in the potash industry as it affects Regina, and in the steel industry—which is a major industry—as it affects Saskatchewan, and particularly Regina.

I do not believe that the seriousness of the agricultural situation can be over-emphasized. If one visits any western Canadian community and listens to what people are saying, the sum total of the information one receives would not give a precise picture of how things are, because people are proud and they do not like to say, "I am in hellish shape financially; I cannot meet my bills; my banker is pressing me; I do not know whether or not I am going to go under." We can appreciate that people do not pass on to one another that kind of information. They are more apt to shrug their shoulders and say, "We have had a pretty good crop; it is one of our better crops; I sure hope we can sell it, because we need the money." However, when one is aware of the precise circumstances, one understands that it is a very serious, indeed a critical situation.

That situation has not come about all at once. It has been a trend that has been going on for some time. But it has been accelerated and made worse by moves taken by the United States. The European Economic Community has been continually troublesome to us; but the Americans have moved in a very major way and have started to charge for a portion of their wheat on the export market the large price of zero—and I guess you cannot get much less than zero unless you pay people to take it off your hands. They have said, "Come and get a package; pay for so much and get 20 per cent as a gift." They have been trying hard, but the information I have is that they have not in any major way eroded our markets, although they have been troublesome and have cost us a good deal in the way of lost income.

In my opinion, with our excellent, efficient Wheat Board marketing system, the markets that we have can be maintained if, as a nation, we are careful to deal with our major importing customers in a way that assures and reassures them that we are interested in more than just selling them our exports. The Soviet Union, our biggest customer, buys one bushel in three, but the trade imbalance is approximately fifty to one. We import approximately $50 million worth of goods from them, and this year we will export to them approximately $1.5 billion worth or more.

We need to develop two-way trade. These countries are looking to us for help, assistance and encouragement, and that is why I have been questioning the Leader of the Government in the Senate on the matter. There is an indication that a couple of people are doing research on the question, that an inter-departmental committee has been formed, but from the very brief answer that was tabled in the Senate yesterday my impression is that the government is not aware of the enormous risk to this country of losing that major market, or a large part of that major market, if we do not react in a very positive way. I am not referring to $1.5 billion worth of goods going each way. I am referring to a greater effort on the part of Canadian authorities to help facilitate the movement of goods into Canada and to ensure that these countries are welcomed and helped to compete in our market.

I think that over the years—and it did not happen just a year or two ago—the dismantling of the old Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce was a mistake, that it was a mistake to tuck the department into External Affairs as a kind of afterthought or as a subsidiary of that department. I do not think that this move was the best way to deal with the situation. I think that this move has created the danger that we will not have the thrust required to improve our export markets. Making trade subservient to general foreign policy could cost Canada existing markets and impede much needed market expansion. Some foreign policy statements or initiatives undertaken by the minister or other officials of the Department of External Affairs might so strain our relations with important commercial customers as to endanger the market for our export commodities. When the Right Honourable Joe Clark deals effectively in the field of human rights, he may be the very last member of cabinet who should have the responsibility for trade and the responsibility of promoting sales of grain, livestock, lumber or other products.

In my judgment, the Secretary of State for External Affairs does not need to have this major, excessive responsibility. He does not need two big hats. It would be much better and more effective for Canada to establish a separate Department of Trade and Commerce, a major, powerful, independent department headed by a senior, high ranking minister. If this were done, such a minister, sitting at the cabinet table with a strong voice, could be instrumental in increasing the penetration of Canadian goods into export markets. A new, distinct Department of Trade and Commerce headed by a senior minister would give international trade a powerful voice, as I have said, around the cabinet table and it would clarify and strengthen Canada's policy thrust in trade negotiations. Such a minister could more effectively undertake trade negotiations based on Canadian economic interests and could provide the means to bring about expanded and diversified exports. He or she could facilitate counter-trade, where advisable, in the interests of securing and expanding Canadian markets. Such a new department with new goals and initiatives is urgently needed for the very survival of Canada as a major trading nation.

As Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, I had the honour of dealing with some of these countries that I have in mind. It seems to me that when these countries send representatives to deal in the economic field, they do not send their foreign policy people but their economic people. We need our own, independent foreign policy. I am not talking here about alterations to that policy. I am just saying that this country should once again have a man with the type of vision and authority of an Honourable C.D. Howe in charge of a department of trade and commerce. I think that such a minister in charge of an independent department could make a major economic and beneficial impact for Canada.

Agricultural producers out west are in very serious trouble. It is not only the small farmer who is in trouble but efficient farmers, farmers who are normally able to make a good living. I could recite today statistics put out by the Farm Credit Corporation or bankruptcy statistics to show the increase in bankruptcies among farmers, but I merely want to try—and I have not rehearsed what I am about to say, nor do I have any notes—to tell you something of the stress and difficulty these people are facing. Young farmers have come to me and said, "Look, we are not able to meet our obligations. We don't think that with the price of grain being as low as it is we can continue to meet our interest payments. But we are efficient farmers. This is our only occupation. This is the only thing we know." Husbands will say, "I am 45 years of age" or "I am 50 years of age. What am I going to do if I go to the city? Can't something be done to reduce my interest obligations, which are now at 14 per cent, to perhaps 6 per cent and a debt load that I can handle?"

Another farmer said to me, "I am a three-section farmer. If I could salvage half of the farm, six quarters, and be given a chance to meet a reduced obligation on that six quarters of land, I would have a chance." I have noticed that when Dome Petroleum or other companies are in trouble, they obtain a rescheduling of their debt or have part of it turned into equity. The banks do not foreclose on the big companies. Let us face it, the banks do not foreclose on billionaire companies; the banks foreclose on the little people who are virtually defenceless, who cannot hire a lawyer—if a lawyer can do anything for them—because they do not have the money to pay for legal counsel. The pressure from the lending institutions on these young farmers with families is enormous. The lending institutions get them to sign over a couple of quarters of land, and that finances things for a little while. Then they sign over another couple of quarters of land. Step by step the credit institutions are putting pressure on these young farmers with families and they are folding up. This government does not really have an answer. I realize that boards are being formed, but they have very little teeth and no authority to reduce interest rates, to reduce obligations or even to talk. If the creditors cannot be convinced that that farmer with his existing debt can pay his way, the chances of his being able to stay on the farm, I think, are not very great.

The government then comes along with the transition program. On a Monday, tax reductions to the oil industry in western Canada amounting to $1.5 billion were put in place. Two days later, the government announces the transition policy for farmers leaving their farms, of whom there are 9,000. The amount allotted to that program is $46 million. What does the government propose to pay the farm family that is leaving the farm to go to the city? The first month, $1,600. For the next five months, $140 per week for the breadwinner or the head of the household; $24 per week for the dependant spouse and $16 per week for each of the dependants. When I add that up for a family of four, it comes to just under $800 per month.

At the end of six months, the transition program comes to an end. What will the farm family do in the city at the end of six months? If the breadwinner has a job, fine. However, jobs are hard to get in the city. The farmer may be a welder, but the city of Regina does not need any welders. In fact, Regina has too many welders right now. Also, every farmer cannot run into the city and start welding. Therefore, at the end of the six-month transition program, the farm family in the city may have to go on welfare. I say, perhaps with a little sarcasm, that they should not be too discouraged since they will receive just a little bit more on welfare; not much, but a shade more than the Department of Agriculture is proposing to pay under the transition program.

Therefore, honourable senators, I think that the transition program is not the answer. I think it is a statement of defeat. It is a matter of giving up, and I do not think that that is good enough.

The situation in the west has been further eroded because of local conditions this fall. A lot of farmers got quite a bit of grain off, combined and harvested before the bad weather set in. However, the majority of that grain came off after about six weeks of bad weather, so the grades are down and, consequently, the prices are down. The farmers took roughly a 20 per cent reduction in initial prices that went into effect on August 1. Then, because of the bad weather, they probably took another 33 per cent loss because of lower grades. Also, there is a program of cash advances in effect. Everyone brags about the cash advances, and I suppose we all should brag wherever we have a chance. I will give the government credit whenever they take some initiatives that are worthy of credit, and certainly we doubled the amount of the cash advances. Under a Liberal administration, when a farmer took a cash advance, if he wished to do so he could declare that as current income. That privilege or that rule has been changed by the Department of National Revenue and that cash advance can no longer be declared as income. That situation makes it more difficult for farmers under certain circumstances to manage their income, and I think that that move was a retrograde step.

However, with the drop in the initial prices, the cash-advance rate per bushel of wheat was dropped, so some farmers with very low-grade wheat today are receiving a cash advance that is approximately the same amount as the price of the low-grade wheat.

In order to illustrate the situation, I will tell you about a neighbour of mine. The other night I talked to him on the telephone and he said: "Hazen, I just trucked in a load of my durum wheat." Senator Barootes will know that durum is selling on the international market on a premium basis. However, my neighbour's durum wheat was graded number five, since it had been weathered. He said to me: "I took a cash advance and when I hauled in a bushel of number five wheat, the money I received for it is not quite enough to pay the cash advance." This person, then, who has taken close to his yearly income in one cash advance, has gone around, as I have often done myself, and paid his creditors. Then when it is all gone, you need to put fuel in the tanks for the winter, you want to feed your family, you would like to pay some of your household bills and you cannot because you do not have any money left. That is the situation.

It used to be that when people said: "There is a crisis out there," others would say that it was some wild-eyed radicals from the National Farmers' Union who were howling and all upset, but that one should not pay too much attention to them. Then the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool came in and they asked for $2 million. A lot of people said: "That is far too much money." Then a week or so ago the annual meeting of the United Grain Growers was held in Saskatoon. That organization covers the three prairie provinces. The United Grain Growers is a co-operative, but they have an entirely different philosophy to that of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool. To quite an extent the United Grain Growers believe in the open-market system. They believe in larger farms; they believe in higher capitalization; they believe in greater inputs of fertilizers, herbicides, pesticides and so on. They believe in more intensive farming. They believe that the way to go is to become a larger, more efficient farm. Some of them are the elite amongst farmers. At their convention, they made a motion. What was their motion? "We are in terrible shape; we need a deficiency payment of $4 billion in western Canada." In other words, they asked for $50 an acre, and some of their delegates stood up and said: "Unless that kind of action is taken and taken soon, we will not be back for the next convention. We will have gone under in the meantime."

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Senator Argue, can you tell me what does an acre produce? How much would a farmer get from an acre?

Senator Argue: Do you mean if he had a crop from that acre?

Senator Frith: Yes, and presuming he got a decent price for that crop.

Senator Argue: Let us say, before the price went down, it was $4 per bushel, and calculating it on an average yield I suppose 50 bushels per acre would be close to an average for western Canada. Therefore, that is $120 per acre. Today, although that same farmer may be getting 30 bushels of wheat per acre, if it is low-grade wheat or if it is weathered—and a lot of it is weathered—he will receive $2 per bushel. That is $60 per acre. Even at that, he is not sure he can sell it. No one knows whether he can sell it. The high-grade wheat has big quotas. The low-grade wheat is a drug on the market because there is a surplus of corn and feed grains in the world. Our wheat, which should have been bread wheat, normally of high quality carrying a premium on the international market, a large part of it is now feed grains and is added to that surplus on the market.

Therefore, what the United Grain Growers are saying is that if a farmer can get $50 per seeded acre, that would be a compensation that would allow him to continue. From the standpoint of this country as a nation, the attitude should not be to drive the farmers off the farms. If the future of farming in this country is anything like the past, we can look forward to the same cycles as we have gone through in the past. In other words, things look bleak on the international markets and then, for whatever reasons, things pick up; the countries get a little higher purchasing power; some of the major producers of grain may have lower than normal crops; world demand goes up and things turn around. Therefore the philosophy out there is the same as my philosophy, and that is that it is in the economic interests of this nation in this time of crisis to come forward with some payments that will allow the farmers to stay farming. I am not pleading here for the big farmers. I say it should be cut off at a certain limit. I am not interested in making pleas for the big farmers; I am interested in seeing about getting a larger income into the hands of the middle-sized and smaller farmers, because they are the backbone of the country.

What is being done is not adequate. What is being done may be sleight of hand. The payment that is being promised may not be as substantial as is being promoted. The billion dollars, when it is altered, will mean perhaps $700 million for western Canada. I do not know the exact figures because I am not privy to them, but it will perhaps mean less than a billion dollars.

Let us suppose it is $700 million, or whatever, farmers will still look forward to that. That seems to be the way it is going, but what about the promise of the Prime Minister of this country of a two-priced wheat as high as $11 a bushel? A committee was set up which brought in a recommendation for two-priced wheat at $10 a bushel, yet nothing has been done. That promise was to pay $200 million more to farmers and it has not been fulfilled. So if the government pays $700 million now under one program, but fails to keep a commitment of another $200 million under another program, then the net gain is $500 million.

[Senator Frith.]

What I raised earlier today may have sounded complicated, but it is not complicated. It is not complicated at all if you are the seller of high-grade wheat and your wheat went on the international markets of the world and the Canadian Wheat Board made an earned surplus of, say, 50 cents a bushel. That is a reasonable guess. Now, because the lower grades have lost money—let us say 60 cents a bushel—you take the 60 cents off the 50 cents and nobody gets anything, and when that precise situation occurred when the Liberals were in office and the pressure was from the Conservative opposition that still had the numbers in those days, and promoted by Ab Douglas, the then member of Parliament for Assiniboia, the government split off the durum account from the spring wheat account and took the existing surplus that belonged rightfully to the durum producers and paid it out to them. Now, I am saying what should be done is that those individual accounts for which the government established a floor price, an initial price, should be allowed to stand on their own feet, and where there is a surplus they should be paid out.

To show just how unfair it is, in my part of the country—and there are other parts of the country with higher-grade wheat—we might have had five, eight or ten bushels of high-grade wheat last year. The farmers were looking forward to a final payment, perhaps 50 cents a bushel, and now the indication is that unless action is taken by the government they will not receive that payment. They were expecting that payment and now it is gone. I think they are entitled to that payment, and if action is not taken, it will be gone. That may account for a loss of $300 million, I do not know, but it is big.

If one takes $300 million from the $500 million, the deficiency payment decreases to $200 million, and next year another decision has to be made by the government—that is, does the government keep the initial prices where they are, or does it drop them again? The international price probably indicates that if the floor prices are not to constitute any risk to the treasury, they need to be dropped. If they are reduced again by the exact amount that they were reduced this past spring, if they go down by a similar amount next year, that could be a loss of three quarters of a billion dollars if it is a dollar a bushel.

So, if you take the $700 million going out now, and take off the money that was promised for the two-priced wheat, and you take off the theft of the surplus in the high-grade wheat account, and the government reduces the initial prices, then that deficiency payment is entirely lost, and indeed farmers could be worse off by about $500 million. Action should be taken to prevent this abhorrent result.

I would suggest that there should be a moratorium on farm foreclosures. The foreclosures should be stopped, not just by the Farm Credit Corporation but foreclosures instigated by all financial institutions should be stopped until a new regime can be put in place. The producer should be paid his final payment for high-grade wheat. A two-price wheat system should be put into effect. Initial prices should be maintained. Income payments should be provided based on a family farm, and so there could be a cut off or a limitation on the moneys that are paid so that there is more money in the coffers of the individual farm family.

I have said this before in the chamber—it sounds degrading, perhaps—but I think it is an absolute shame and a disgrace to this country that low as welfare payments are farmers are virtually barred from the benefit of those payments just because they are farmers.

I have gone to welfare offices with farmers to make application for welfare. I have gone to the appeal board, and what they say is, "Spend your 1985 income." However, that is long gone. There was not enough income in 1985, yet they say, "Live off your 1985 income." Or they say, "Sell your land," but they do not have any land to sell because it is tied up because of mortgages. Or they say, "Go and get a cash advance and live off that and don't pay the local merchant, don't pay the fuel dealer, don't pay the person who gave you the fertilizer and don't pay your taxes." So farmers are really barred, and that is extremely bad from the standpoint of the farm family because there is no security whatsoever.

Under the Canada Assistance Plan and the provincial assistance plans, farmers should be given a basic minimum income for food, clothing and shelter for the farm family that is on the farm and wishes to continue farming and does not have an income. Others have come out in support of that. Professor Daryl Kraft of the University of Manitoba recommended exactly that the other day. I think that the whole system should be opened up. It should not be a system only for those living in urban areas, it should be a system for everyone.

I have read the statistics regarding the percentage of farmers going bankrupt. They are few in number, according to the statistics. However, bankruptcy is only one way out. A farmer can just drive away one morning and say he has had enough, or the banker can tell the farmer to sign it off and keep a granary of wheat worth $3,000, and that would be better than going bankrupt.

But the sad and shocking part is that nearly everybody is in trouble. There is the potential for everyone to get into trouble because many farms are going on the market. Creditors have taken them over and they are advertising those farms for sale. Older farmers who want to retire and who are endeavouring to sell their land are having difficulty selling it. Where I live there is a great deal of good land on the market, but there are no buyers. The price of farm land is collapsing, and if the price of farm land comes down, that is not only a loss of equity to the farmer who has a heavy mortgage but is a loss of a life's investment by all farmers, even though some of them may have, particularly the older ones, clear title to their land.

I still hear what one older farmer said ringing in my ears. He said: "Hazen, I have built my farm. I am 70 years of age and I now want to retire, but I cannot get a buyer, so I am forced to continue farming."

• (1600)

The equity is being lost, and it is being lost for everybody. Action has to be taken by way of stopping foreclosures, stopping the land going on the market; action has to be taken by way of putting more income into the hands of the producers out there. Yes, some day, some government, the Farm Credit Corporation and others—and the credit unions are putting out learned papers this way now—may say that there has to be some kind of a land reserve so that when farmers are not able to continue farming that land is not put on the market to drive the value of land further and further down.

So, I hope that parliamentarians will consider this very serious, threatening agricultural situation. I hope they will look at our people who are farming, and at the land and the resources that go into agriculture as a great Canadian natural resource that should be protected during this time of adversity.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to, and the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne adopted.

On motion of the Honourable C. William Doody, ordered that the Address be engrossed and presented to Her Excellency the Governor General by the Honourable the Speaker.

BANK OF BRITISH COLUMBIA BUSINESS CONTINUATION

BANKING TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-27

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have before me now the motion which was discussed earlier today on the subject matter of Bill C-27. I would like leave to revert to Notices of Motions to present that motion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-27, An Act to facilitate the continuation of the business of the Bank of British Columbia, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we have waived the customary notice so that this motion could be put at this time. We are prepared to accept the motion so that a pre-study of this bill can begin. We do so because it is an emergency situation, as has been represented by the government. We are responding to that emergency situation by some extraordinary legislative waivers. I indicated earlier today—and I will not repeat what I said—the necessity of having the appropriate witnesses, and I hope that the government will cooperate in meeting the requirement for witnesses, because it will certainly facilitate matters if all these witnesses have been heard before the bill itself arrives in the Senate late tomorrow.

Senator Doody: I thank Senator MacEachen for that remark. The government is doing everything it possibly can to get the witnesses in time. I think that Senator Sinclair has made considerable progress in that direction already, and I think that the wishes of the committee will be satisfied.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-EUROPE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

MEETINGS HELD IN ITALY

Hon. Heath Macquarrie rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, October 28, 1986:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to The Meetings of the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association held in Italy from 21st to 31st March, 1986.

He said: Honourable senators, my delay in getting to this particular item in no way reflects my view on the excursion by the important parliamentary delegation which met in Italy.

The report has been printed and attached to Hansard. I am sure every senator has read it avidly, and I will not repeat what was in the report.

This was the first delegation of parliamentarians meeting with their Italian homologues in that country on a mutually pre-arranged program, sponsored by the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association. We were chaired by the chairman of that group, Mr. Ellis, MP, who was the splendid and sensitive leader of our group. We were very fortunate to have also in the delegation Mr. Vincent Della Noce, MP, who is the Chairman of the Canada-Italy Parliamentary Friendship Group. He knows both Italy and the language so well that he was a great help to those of us less qualified linguistically.

It is not a mere ritual to say that it was a pleasure to be abroad with the delegation, including our colleague, Senator Bonnell, Messrs. Orlikow, Malepart and MacDougall from the House of Commons. In Madame Danielle Parent-Belisle we had a most impressive and efficient executive secretary. I want to say, too, that it was a most excellent gesture on the part of Mr. Leonardo Leone of Toronto, the former president of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council and also President of the Italian Canadian Association, to go to Italy and be with us for several days. Indeed, from time to time he became a sort of on-the-spot translator/interpreter and was magnificent in that role and helped us greatly in some of the social events, drawing on his profound knowledge of the country and of the language.

● (1610)

By nature, politicians are not known for any deficiency in vanity, nor do they leave all of it at home when they go abroad. But I want to say what an excellent group we had, among which there was not even one of those important people who is always late for functions. That made it quite a star situation which I, naturally, appreciated very much since I am one of those who are never late!

[Senator MacEachen.]

Mr. Ellis, as well as being a good parliamentarian, is a good businessman. I was impressed by the arrangements that were made to get this delegation to Rome in a fairly inexpensive—if air travel is ever inexpensive—way. We went Apex, which I think is a very good idea when delegations know many months before that they have to travel.

I was never sure whether we had cancellation insurance coverage, which I think is an absolute necessity in the case of trips such as that, because if you miss a particular connection it can be a very costly business to get back on another scheduled flight.

Another matter which is always of concern to me during these parliamentary trips is whether everyone is covered by Blue Cross. If you are not covered by such a plan and you find it necessary to go to hospital, you will find OHIP coverage quite inadequate.

When I was in the other place, I remember Mr. Stevens posing an excellent question to the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Chrétien. Of course, I will not be attending the Liberal Convention, so I am not deliberately mentioning that name. The question made reference to how high Canadian taxes were as compared to American. During his brilliant question, Mr. Stevens gave about five examples. Mr. Chrétien responded by saying that that was the case, but pointed out that Mr. Stevens had mentioned nothing about services rendered in the two countries. Mr. Chrétien then gave the illustration of a Canadian who went to Florida and had a heart attack, and when he got the doctor's bill he had another one.

The delegation was so frugal that we hired our own bus and we spent a lot of time on that bus. Unfortunately, some of those beautiful Italian cities do not always have an Appian Way through the middle of them. It sometimes takes a long time to get from one part of the city to the other. Fortunately, the bus was quite comfortable and we had a congenial group.

I had some reservations about our wisdom, if not our geniality, on the first day. Even the most vigorous of senators finds a trans-Atlantic trip fairly strenuous. We discovered that any compensation for such a sissy thing as jet lag was just not in the cards.

We landed in Milan and had to make four high-powered visitations to officials in the city and in the region. When all of this is done in two languages, it proves to be a pretty strenuous endeavour. During the few minutes that we did have to ourselves, I went to see the Milan cathedral, which is one of the most beautiful church structures in the world.

To show what great sports we were—and some may use another word—on our first evening we went to La Scala and saw “La Sonnambula,” by Bellini, the great master of the opera. Honourable senators, while we were not walking in our sleep, we were pretty well sleeping while we were walking. We were part of the famous audience that is supposed to interfere so much with the performers. They seemed very interesting and demanding, but I could have done, perhaps, without their exceptional directions to the people on the stage.

Our visit just happened to coincide with an occurrence which put our Italian counterparts into quite a tizzy. The day we were to spend with our parliamentary friends and colleagues was the day that the U.S. bombed some Libyan establishments in the Gulf of Sidra. The whole of the Italian Parliament went into action.

In that country the Prime Minister appears before each house to make his announcement. He then hears from a spokesman from each of the parliamentary groups, which would be about seven in one case and five or six in the upper house, the Senate. Although one did not know the language, one could sense that the Italian parliamentarians were very disturbed. I often think—this is an old theme of mine—that instead of the Americans constantly advising the Europeans how they should adapt to such and such, it might be better if the transmission were the other way. Then we might find those in Washington giving a little more thought to the views and judgments of the people in western Europe. It is not just a cliché to say that they are much closer to a lot of these things. It is true geographically, and I think in depth and in history it is also extremely important and true.

There are observations one might make about the Italian Senate. It is an elected body much more involved in the supervision of the government. Indeed, the Senate can bring down the government by a vote of censure.

I suppose most senators have been in Italy a good many times. I heard some rather premature laughter from some of my colleagues when I said at one of our meetings, in a preliminary way, that Italy was a much older country than Canada. I am sure they thought I was a bit off track. Then I went on to say that as a nation we are about the same age. There never was an Italian political entity until the 1870s. Of course, we know that there was an Italia down through the ages in the days of Julius Caesar and before, but, politically, it is a new country like ours. The Italian constitution has evolved. I think it is an impressive document and it is impressive in reality. It is a new country in the sense that its present institutions are only post-war. It is interesting to note that there is a novelty in their political institutions superimposed upon that great antiquity which thrills and moves us all. No one could but be moved by a walk through any Italian city, but especially through eternal Rome.

On the way back, as is my custom when I want to relax, I was reading a good mystery novel by Daphne Du Maurier who had described a tour guide in a Rome hotel as saying:

We use certain code words for our clients in the touring business. The English are beef to us and the Americans barbarians. It may not be complimentary, but it's apt. These people were running wild on pasture land and prairie when we were ruling the world from Rome. No offence intended.

Our one day spent in Florence put us in touch with what Byron called that "Etrusian Athens."

In one brief walk, unique with history centuries old and gloriously rich, I was looking around to see some evidence of the great literary figure Boccaccio, who must be great because the father of English prose and poetry, Chaucer, was inspired by Boccaccio's Decameron. But there was very little to be seen by way of statuary. Then I looked up my history and I found out what happened. I went to one of our great poets, Byron, and found that the Church at a later time decided that this man was not what he should have been, so many of the ruins and memorials were destroyed by those people whom Byron described as "hyena bigots". I suppose that that is the worst kind of bigot to be, a "hyena bigot".

Boccaccio does not stand in the glory that I think he deserves, because his statuary was razed by the ruling bigots of this great city which had, indeed, a lot of poor rulers—and a lot of glorious ones—down through the years. But, thank God, in some great way its beauty has been left for the most part unimpaired. These great cities, these great civilizations and these great people belong to us all.

Honourable senators, it was a great joy to me to share the experience through our meetings, which lasted a week and taught us a great deal. Weariness, some, but a little weariness is a small price to pay for an opportunity to converse with our opposite numbers over there and to do it in the wonderful environment of such places as Rome, Florence, Milan and Pompeii—but I will not tell senators anything about Pompeii because we are supposed to be restrained, sober and sedate here.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIRST REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED, PRINTED AS APPENDIX AND ADOPTED

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, on behalf of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, the Joint Chairman, I have the honour to present the First Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix "A", p. 279.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Nurgitz, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be taken into consideration now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps Senator Godfrey can explain why he needs leave to proceed now.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, we have had difficulty holding an organization meeting. We finally held one this morning. The problem is that we require a majority of both the members of the House of Commons and of the Senate to hold this meeting. The Senate has had no problem producing its majority, but it was not until this morning that we got a majority from the House of Commons. The main point of the organization meeting is to reduce the quorum to four members so that we can operate. We wish to hold a meeting, whether the Senate is sitting or not, next Thursday morning, and we wanted to reduce the quorum. We require the approval of the Senate in order to hold that meeting. I should also explain that this report is in the usual form of the first report introduced at the start of a session. It contains the reference that it has contained for some years, to look into the question of regulations. It contains the usual 15 criteria under which we have been operating for about the past 12 years. I believe that the two chairmen got together with the clerk and polished up the language somewhat, but I cannot cite the specifics at this point. We have requested that the committee have the power to engage the services of such staff and such stenographic and clerical staff as may be required and that it be empowered to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate. We need the power to sit during sittings of the Senate because we meet with the House of Commons and on occasion on a Thursday afternoon at 3.30 when the Senate may be sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix "B", p. 280.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

Arrangements have been made for the Minister of Finance and the Minister of State for Finance to appear before the committee at 5 o'clock. The members of the committee would welcome the attendance of any senator who is interested, particularly if they wish to avail themselves of the opportunity of putting questions to the ministers while they are before the committee.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SYRIA—JOINT ACTION BY CANADA AND OTHER NATIONS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the announcement that the Canadian ambassador to Syria has returned to Damascus encourages me to see whether we can tie up some loose ends which were left untied in our Question Period of several weeks ago. At that time, in raising the question of Canadian policy towards Syria, the Leader of the Government said that while there was a possibility that Canada might sever diplomatic relations with Syria, its main concern was to develop concerted action against Syria by a group of countries. In his reply he referred to the meeting which was to be held on November 10 of the European Economic Community and the visit to Canada by the United States representatives.

My question relates to whether any concerted action by Canada with other countries against Syria has been put together and, if so, what are the elements of that concerted action.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition will be aware that the meeting of the foreign ministers of the European Economic Community did take place in London on November 10 and that they agreed on certain measures they would take. I do not have a list of them in front of me, but they did agree on certain steps.

I am also aware that both Italy and the Federal Republic of Germany took steps, in the one case, involving their diplomatic relations with Syria and, in the other case, with respect to the sale of arms to that country.

Senator MacEachen: My question really is: If other countries have moved, what are the elements of Canada's action against Syria?

Senator Murray: We could not cease selling arms to Syria because we were not selling arms to Syria in the first place.

We did, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, recall our ambassador for consultations. My honourable friend will have seen in the media, as I have today, that the ambassador is returning with a message to the Government of Syria concerning support by that country or other countries for terrorist activities.

Senator MacEachen: I will not go beyond one more question because on October 29 I asked the Leader of the Government the following question:

What is the concerted action that Canada is recommending?

The Leader of the Government said previously that it was the position of the Canadian government that the best action would be a concerted action with other countries.

The Leader of the Government told me that I would know in a few days, or in due course, because there were various sanctions and other diplomatic weapons that could be brought into play in a situation of this kind.

Am I to conclude that all that Canada has done or is doing is to arm the Canadian ambassador with a stern note for the authorities in Damascus; that the objective of concerted action has disappeared; and that Canada is not part of any concerted action, except to send the ambassador back with a stiff note?

Senator Murray: The Leader of the Opposition should not necessarily draw that conclusion so far as Canada's action is concerned.

I will inquire to see what other steps may have been taken by us or are contemplated by us with regard to Syria.

It was our view then and it remains our view that it is important that there be concerted action in the sense that all of the western allies should act in this matter. As I have indicated, Great Britain, in its way, West Germany and Italy, in their respective ways, have done so. I might also add that the United States has done so.

Senator MacEachen: That really leaves the Government of Canada—and, I must say, the Leader of the Government—totally exposed to the charge that while other countries have done something, Canada has done nothing, except to send a note back with the ambassador.

What I should like to know is whether we have done anything except send the ambassador back to Damascus.

Senator Murray: I simply remind the Leader of the Opposition that the action we did take in recalling our ambassador was taken before other countries acted at all. As I indicated to the Leader of the Opposition, I will see what other action may have been taken or is contemplated by the government.

Senator Balfour: How much more should we have done?

Senator MacEachen: It was not I who talked about “concerted action.”

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have two delayed answers to questions. Following the usual procedure, I will not read them unless specifically asked to do so. I will simply identify them and ask that they be printed as part of today's proceedings.

THE MINISTRY

ROLE OF DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on November 4, 1986, a question was raised by the Honourable Senator Stewart regarding the Ministry—Role of Deputy Prime Minister.

(The answer follows:)

The role of the Deputy Prime Minister has developed in the last ten years, but specific responsibilities within the Ministry will vary depending on the wishes of the Prime Minister.

The office of the Deputy Prime Minister began with Mr. MacEachen in 1977. Senator MacEachen was then, as Mr. Mazankowski is now, President of the Privy Council and Government House Leader. Later, Senator MacEachen held the title conjointly with Finance and later the External Affairs portfolios.

Mr. Chrétien was Secretary of State for External Affairs and Deputy Prime Minister in the Turner government.

In the Mulroney government, Mr. Nielsen held the title of Deputy Prime Minister when he was President of the Privy Council and later Minister of National Defence.

The present Deputy Prime Minister has the specific responsibilities of Government House Leader, chairman and vice-chairman of various Cabinet committees, and that of offering general support to the Prime Minister in the co-ordination of government.

INDUSTRY

AEROSPACE—ALLOCATION OF CF-18 SERVICE CONTRACT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on November 6, 1986, a question was raised by the Honourable Léopold Langlois regarding Industry—Aerospace—Allocation of CF-18 Service Contract.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Could we have that answer read, please?

Senator Doody: Certainly. The answer reads as follows:

When the decision was made to establish a Canadian capability to perform systems engineering and repair and overhaul for the CF-18, it was recognized that no single Canadian company could handle a task of this magnitude. In July 1984, a letter of interest was sent to all major Canadian aerospace companies outlining the work requirements. From this letter of interest, three consortia emerged, led, respectively, by Litton Systems Canada Limited, Canadair and IMP Group. The Litton group adopted “CAST-18” as an informal name—CAST standing for Canadian Aerospace Support Team. This name does not, however, have any legal standing, and there has been no change in name or membership of any of the consortia during the bidding process. Subsequently, on July 17, 1985, Bristol Aerospace assumed the lead for the CAST-18 group.

A request for proposals was issued in August 1985 to the three consortia, and bids were received in late November. No unsolicited proposals were received after this deadline. Communications were received, however, from two of the consortia, Bristol and Canadair, offering to enter into negotiations to modify their bids. These communications contained no commitments with regard to price reductions or other changes, and the one from Bristol was subsequently withdrawn. In any case, neither was considered in the evaluation process or in the decision to proceed with a bid repair process.

The proposals of all three consortia were found to contain deficiencies, preventing the award of a contract at that time. All the companies were briefed on their weaknesses, and requested to submit revised proposals, which were evaluated commencing April 18, 1986. No other tenders or proposals were received.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION

MEMBERSHIP

Question No. 2 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall

28th October, 1986—What are the names of the members of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, (i) by province; (ii) by date of appointment?

Reply by the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada:

The Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, Gordon Fairweather, was appointed on September 1, 1977. At the time he lived in New Brunswick, and I understand that he still maintains a home there. The Deputy Chief Commissioner, Rita Cadieux, was also appointed on September 1, 1977, and she now resides in Ontario. Three part-time Commissioners were recently appointed on October 8, 1986. They are Diane Boissinot from Quebec, Gerald John Kambeitz from British Columbia and Bhausahab Ubale from Ontario.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

CENTRE BLOCK—PHOTOGRAPHS OF BRITISH PRIME MINISTERS

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, before proceeding to the Orders of the Day, may I crave the indulgence of honourable senators for a few moments.

In November of last year I called the attention of the Senate by way of an Inquiry, I believe, to the removal of the portraits of British Prime Ministers from the sixth floor corridor leading to the Parliamentary Restaurant. I am glad to note that they have now been restored, not exactly to their original places because space was left for the Prime Ministers of Canada in the areas nearest to the Parliamentary Restaurant—

Senator Macquarrie: Yes, which is proper and in order.

Senator Hicks: I agree with Senator Macquarrie when he says that that is perfectly proper and in order.

The portraits of the British Prime Ministers have been restored to their place, and I think that makes an interesting display linking us to the Mother of Parliaments from which this Parliament derives so many of its practices and institutions.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I would only add that if they do that, they should do it right. I have the impression that there is at least one former British Prime Minister whose photograph is not hanging with the others.

Senator Hicks: Portraits of some of the more recent Prime Ministers are not hanging there. There is more than one missing, I think. My assumption, honourable senators, is that this is only a temporary omission and that it will be corrected. I hope that is so.

Senator Le Moynes: I hope Bannerman's portrait is not missing.

NATIONAL FINANCE

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Second Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (supplementary budget regarding examination of post-secondary education), presented in the Senate on November 26, 1986.

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I move that this report be adopted.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Leblanc.

Can the senator tell us whether the budget sub-committee has assured him that the funds are available for this supplementary budget?

Senator Leblanc: As chairman of the committee, I have appeared before the budget sub-committee. The budgets required for the examination of the estimates and legislation, as well as the supplementary budget regarding examination of post-secondary education have been adopted. These budgets have been submitted to the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, which has also adopted them.

Senator Frith: Very well.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it the pleasure of honourable senators to adopt the report?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

"A PEOPLE APART—NATIVES IN SASKATOON"

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Buckwold calling the attention of the Senate to a special report by the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix entitled "A People Apart—Natives in Saskatoon".—(Honourable Senator Adams).

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I have been stalling for the past couple of days. I know that Senator Buckwold has been asking when I was going to speak on this newspaper report. I think that Senator Buckwold and Senator Marchand did very well in their presentations a couple of weeks ago. They were very interesting and informative. The article in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix is very realistic, especially with regard to those native people who live in the cities. I realize that our culture is different and that it is difficult for native people to live in cities. For a thousand years we knew only one way of life, and then everything changed. I see the same changes coming in the Territory. The communities there are growing and new people are settling in them all the time. Most people come to take up government jobs and to teach.

At one time native families taught the younger members how to survive and how to live off the land. Today it is different, because young people have to be educated and they have to find a job. No longer can they live off the land. Before, we did not have to worry about people coming through our land. Now, every year we worry about what the summer will bring. At one time summers and falls were spent preparing for trapping and getting back to the land. This is no longer the case, because most of my people live in communities. Nowadays they hunt on weekends. My people cannot afford to live off the land today. They must have a snowmobile whereas at one time a dog team and a boat were enough. No longer does Hudson's Bay buy furs, even furs such as seal and fox. At one time you could make a living off those furs, but the prices today are not high enough to cover the costs of gas, food, traps and all the things that are necessary to live off the land. It is better for my people to live in communities where government provides them with houses. Some even say that they are better off living on welfare. I know that it is not right, but it is the only way these people can live in communities. The kids must finish school to get a job with the Department of Indian Affairs, the government, the oil companies or in private enterprise.

We are having problems with kids dropping out of school. Most of the trade jobs in government or in private enterprise require that you have a grade 10 or grade 12 education. Kids who do not have this education will not be hired. They must go back to school and take adult education or upgrading. That is the way the system works. Judging from what is written in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, it seems to be the same in the cities. People are beginning to get frustrated. To get upgrading, my people have to go south to either Winnipeg or Edmonton where the training programs are. They must apprentice for five years and then take an exam. Apprenticing in northern communities is different from apprenticing in cities. Before I came to the Senate, I was an electrician and did most of my work in the community. I know of a fellow who apprenticed for five years while working for the government. When it was time for him to take his exam, he came down south. The teacher gave him books on electricity and how it works. Some of the people in the class had only worked on houses doing conventional wiring. That teacher assigned this fellow some commercial work, which is very different.

People are allowed to bring liquor into most of the communities, and this is where most problems begin, particularly with young people. They do not understand how to control their drinking and they get into trouble with the law. Many of these kids ride around the community while drinking, and they do not know that they are breaking the law. Suddenly, they are confronted by an RCMP officer and told that they are breaking the law. Many of these communities are run by by-laws. For example, many of the communities have curfews. Sometimes people run around and drink in the streets because they get feeling good and just run out in the street and raise hell, and the next thing you know they are picked up and put in jail within the community. The next thing that happens is that the judge comes along. These people are taken to court and fines are imposed. However, some of these people are not able to pay their fines and they go to jail.

Nowadays in the communities they have a special system called a community work system. When people are unable to pay their fines, then you put them to work in the community. However, in the meantime, that person is not earning money for himself or his family. The work he does earns money to pay the fine imposed by the judge.

A couple of weeks ago I was up in Rankin Inlet at the same time as a court case was going on. The people accused were mostly young people, some from the local community and some from elsewhere. What usually happens is that some lawyers are hired from law practices in Yellowknife to defend some of the offenders. They come up to Rankin Inlet to defend these people, and some of them are not familiar with how the people live in that community.

Then we have a prosecutor who comes from Ottawa and who is also not familiar with any of the people in the community or how the community lives, and he is telling some of those people in the community that they are bad people and they have to go to jail. I do not think that this system of law is right for the people in our communities.

Let us say for the sake of argument that I came from the north and was not familiar with Ottawa and I told you people here in Ottawa that you are doing wrong. I would feel bad, because I am not from Ottawa and I am telling someone that they are doing something wrong. By the same token, these prosecutors who have lived all their lives in Ottawa are coming to northern communities, telling the people in those communities that they are breaking the law and that they have to go to jail or pay a fine. That is why I think sometimes that we still have a lot to learn about the north and that it was not a good idea for the government to step into the north in 1950, which was approximately 36 years ago today.

Having said that, I think some of the native people in the communities have learned a great deal over the last 36 years compared to what they had learned in the 200 years since the beginning of our existence in this country. Now we are learning something through the educational system that was set up 36 years ago.

In the meantime, we still have a long way to go because of the way the government system wants to work within the community. A lot of the native people are not very qualified yet to run their own community under the government system. In other municipalities, of course, it works out very well. The way the government system works, if you need a job you can often get one running the system for the government. I remember only ten years ago you would find the odd local person acting as a member of council. Nowadays every community has a local government or a municipality, and these municipalities are run by the community, and run very well. The government gives them funds and the power to control the community, town planning and road maintenance within the community, and these jobs are held by local people. In fact, it is considered very desirable within the community to have a government job, since the people who hold those jobs are able to control the community.

Last week on The Journal, on CBC television, I saw an item about a Manitoba Indian band. Some of the councillors of that Indian band had decided to control their own community. At that time, a judge was coming in every week from Winnipeg for court cases, charging people within the band. The story was about a particular woman within the band whose name I cannot remember. She decided that that system did not work and that perhaps the band should do it in their own way. Some people had been drinking in the streets and some people had been shot; not very much had changed and the system did not seem to be working. Finally, the members of the band said that they were going to change the system. Someone appointed by the Chief took the gun that had been used in this shooting, went down to the lake and dropped the gun in 80 feet of water. The person who owned the gun was then told: "If you want your gun back, you must go down into 80 feet of water to get it." At that time, the people who had been in trouble realized that they could not continue in the old way. They realized that they would have to listen to their leaders within the community instead of listening to the judge who imposed a fine or sent them to jail for three or four months. A lot of the time, this old system did not work, because the offenders would be gone for three or four months or they would have fines imposed and remain angry because of what had happened. Their attitude was that it does not matter what you do, and sometimes the same things would happen again. Now, however, if someone in the community tells the offender not to do something, he knows that that person will still be in the community when he returns. If that offender gets in trouble again, he knows that he has to face the wrath of the community at large.

I myself have been in the Senate in the last few years and I find the system here very understandable. I think it is right that the people who are the leaders in our communities should work for the right to help our people understand how the system works, especially in matters such as land claims and things of that nature. At least if you understand the system, you have a little more control.

• (1430)

For close to 25 years some of the organizations in the north have travelled repeatedly to Ottawa, specifically to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in an attempt to have some control over land lease arrangements. Very often in the north the education given to individuals is quite inadequate for them to be able to deal adequately with land settlement claims.

Natives have survived in the north for thousands of years. They have done this with their native knowledge of wildlife and the environment. Recently the government has increased its focus on the north because of the threat to wildlife and the environment, but little do they realize that natives have survived in that environment for thousands of years and are aware of the environmental effects of the spring run-off and learning how to live off the land. In that sense, government officials in Ottawa have much to learn from natives.

These people, who have been surviving on the land for thousands of years, are being told by government officials that they do not know how to do so. Native peoples have a knowledge and understanding of such things as the migrating patterns of animals, especially the caribou, and know exactly where the grazing grounds are.

In the winter-time they know how to survive by seal hunting under the ice. Even when the water is frozen, they know how to catch seals. As a child, I thought seals used only one particular hole to come up for air, but seals are not stupid, they use four or five different holes intermittently. Polar bears follow much the same pattern. To catch the seals, the native people use dogs which can sniff through the snow to determine where a seal hole is. Then the hunter pokes down through the snow with a rod. He follows the same procedure on the other side of the hole so as not to damage it. He then drops a string down or puts a feather down and waits for the seals to come up. He is then ready and waiting with his harpoon.

Honourable senators, although this procedure may sound simple, believe me, it is not. If natives do not understand exactly what they are doing, their very existence comes into jeopardy, because they may go hungry for several days.

To me it seems quite ridiculous that learned people from university are going to the north and telling the natives how to survive—I know very well that such a person would not survive, quite apart from the fact that he certainly would not like to eat seal meat.

Honourable senators, since my appointment to this chamber ten years ago, I have become friendly with most of you, but I do not think I have ever spoken of these things before.

I believe that the Senate is a body which can resolve some of these issues. Just a couple of weeks ago Senator Marchand was saying that if the Senate set up a committee to deal with native land claims, we could probably process them much faster. There is no doubt that the native people do need the help and advice from people such as senators on how to control land settlement claims.

Contact with people in Ottawa would mean that natives would better understand the intricacies of government so that if and when self-government is a reality, they can better handle their affairs. The Senate is an ideal body to advise natives, because I know that most senators are familiar with native problems across Canada. We have to work together to help these people. We could offer advice on community issues, education, health, town planning and so much more.

The native peoples are also at somewhat of a disadvantage because Canada, technologically, has been a fast-growing country and our mother tongues have not kept pace with the new technological language of today. The conversation of the natives for centuries has centred around survival, the weather, animals and hunting, and now we find it difficult to keep pace with the technological jargon which is in everyday use. It is particularly important to understand, because 20 or 30 per cent of the time we are faced with having to understand and translate technological phrases which are commonplace since the computer became reality. For example, natives translate the word "computer" to mean "brain," because they relate everything to their physical environment. With all of the technical material coming out, it is difficult for us. Perhaps in another few years the local people will have more of an understanding between the two languages. Perhaps all of these technical terms can be translated.

For the past ten years the Inuit Cultural Institute has been operated at Eskimo Point, and those involved in that institute work with the different universities towards translating some of the Inuit words into English and vice-versa. That is of great benefit to our schools and communities.

Honourable senators, I do not want to keep you any longer. I thank you for listening to me today.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 6.40 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

BANK OF BRITISH COLUMBIA BUSINESS CONTINUATION

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-27

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, pursuant to the reference to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in regard to Bill C-27, I now make the following report:

SIXTH REPORT

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which was referred the subject-matter of the Bill C-27, intituled: "An Act to facilitate the continuation of the business of the Bank of British Columbia", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, 26th November, 1986, examined the subject-matter of the said Bill and now reports with the following observations:

Under the arrangement involving the purchase of the Bank of British Columbia (BBC) by the Hongkong Bank of Canada, the HK Bank will buy virtually all assets and assume virtually all liabilities of the BBC. CDIC will pay the HK Bank $200 million and in return the HK Bank will pay $63.5 million to the shareholders of the BBC. In effect, therefore, the HK Bank of Canada was paid $136.5 million in order to buy the BBC. The Committee's examination left partly unanswered the question of why the BBC shareholders are to receive $63.5 million plus additional recoveries from the liquidation of assets retained by the BBC which may bring the total compensation to nearly $100 million, when the Bank of British Columbia, as evidenced by the CDIC advance to its purchaser, was not viable.

As part of the purchase agreement, the Hongkong Bank of Canada assumed all the outstanding deposit liabilities of the BBC. According to testimony received by the Committee, the HK Bank's parent, the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, in a letter of commitment to the Inspector General of Banks, has undertaken to:

- a) guarantee all of the deposits of its subsidiary, andL/Eb) ensure that its subsidiary will remain sufficiently capitalized to meet all of its obligations under the Bank Act.

The agreement between the BBC and the HK Bank of Canada entails in essence the takeover of a schedule A bank by a bank under schedule B of the Bank Act. Provisions in the Bank Act limit share ownership in a schedule A bank to 10 per cent for any single individual or group and to 25 per cent for foreign investors in the aggregate. The agreement therefore, by using section 273 of the Bank Act, in effect circumvents the limitation on ownership and on nationality contained in the Bank Act.

Respectfully submitted,

IAN SINCLAIR
Chairman

BANK OF BRITISH COLUMBIA BUSINESS CONTINUATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-27, to facilitate the continuation of the business of the Bank of British Columbia.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, this bill has received in a short space of time a very thorough examination and consideration by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Last night, this morning, this afternoon and into this evening, the committee spent some eight hours on this bill. I think I can speak for all honourable senators in expressing our appreciation to the chairman and members of that committee for the diligent and thorough manner in which they went about their work.

The committee has heard from the Governor of the Bank of Canada, from representatives of the Bank of British Columbia and from representatives of the Hongkong Bank of Canada. They have heard evidence from the Minister of Finance and the Minister of State for Finance, from the Acting Inspector General of Banks and from representatives of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. In the course of that testimony, the committee has heard a good deal about the recent history of the Bank of British Columbia, of the factors that led the Bank of British Columbia to seek a buyer, of the factors that led the directors to approve the offer of the Hongkong Bank of Canada over other possible alternatives, and of the role of the Inspector General of Banks, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation and the Bank of Canada in the events leading to this bill. They have also heard evidence as to the participation of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation in the restructuring of the bank and, of course, evidence from the ministers and others as to the necessity and the desirability of the legislative action that is proposed in this bill.

• (1850)

Honourable senators, this is a bank which without restructuring is facing liquidation. That is the statement of the directors and the management of the Bank of British Columbia. It is the evidence of the Inspector General of Banks. It is confirmed and supported by the Governor of the Bank of Canada and by other testimony that the Banking Committee has received. Indeed, that committee, in describing the bank as essentially insolvent, as it has done in the report which the chairman presented a moment ago, states the case in rather stronger language than has been used by the Governor of the Bank of Canada and other witnesses.

In any case, in recent months the erosion of the capital base of the bank became quite serious due to the existence of a number of non-performing loans. I should say in fairness and for the record that it would be quite inaccurate to draw comparisons between the problems of the Bank of British Columbia and those which existed in the two Alberta banks that failed some time ago and with which we were concerned in the previous session of Parliament.

The evidence that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has received indicates quite strongly that the solvency situation of the Bank of British Columbia deteriorated primarily because of the economy. I am sure I need not remind honourable senators of the economic conditions that have had such a negative impact on the west.

In this connection, I can do no better than quote from the testimony given last night by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Bouey. I take this from the unrevised transcript at page A-7:

If I might volunteer this view, this is not a bank where the problems were similar to those of the Alberta banks. In other words, I do not think you will find people saying that this bank engaged in poor lending practices. I think this is a case where their solvency situation deteriorated primarily because of the economy.

The bank, of course, was losing money and the prospects were that there would be a continuing erosion of its position. The time at which it must publish its annual reports was coming up and the impact of that annual report showing considerable losses and a projection of future losses would have had, I would think, a very negative and harmful effect on the situation of the bank.

For some time, then, the bank had been seeking a buyer to assume its assets and liabilities and to put it back on a sound and strong financial footing. The board of directors determined that the best offer was that of the Hongkong Bank of Canada. The proposal is for an asset sale in which the Hongkong Bank of Canada would assume virtually all of the liabilities of the Bank of British Columbia so that the depositors, creditors and borrowers would be fully protected. It is the view of the directors of the bank, the Government of British Columbia and the federal government that this is a very positive transaction for the Bank of British Columbia and, indeed, for the province.

Parliament is being asked to facilitate this transaction. The problem with which we are faced is the fact that under the Bank Act the sale of bank assets and liabilities would have to be approved at a shareholders' meeting 28 days after notice of the terms of sale had been given. That 28-day delay could create uncertainty and could do serious, perhaps fatal, damage to the prospects of the bank. If this bill is passed, an order in council will issue after the bill has been given Royal Assent to authorize the transactions that are involved in this sale. A shareholders' meeting will be called on 14 days' notice to approve the consideration received for the sale of the bank's assets to the Hongkong Bank of Canada. If the shareholders choose, the government will appoint an independent assessor to conduct an appraisal and his or her evaluation will be binding.

Honourable senators, if this bank went under, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation would be a big loser. Therefore, the CDIC is advancing $200 million to the recapitalization of the bank, basically to indemnify the Hongkong Bank of Canada against further deterioration of the non-performing loans. It is the judgment of the CDIC, and it was their evidence before the committee, as it was the evidence of the ministers and other responsible people, that this was the least costly alternative facing the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. If the bank had been liquidated, the CDIC would have had to make something like $1.3 billion in pay-outs to the insured depositors. Of course, there would be a lower recovery value to the CDIC in a liquidation scenario.

Honourable senators, the origins and history of the Bank of British Columbia are closely related to the aspirations of British Columbians and of people in western Canada generally for financial institutions based in the region, with roots in that region, serving the regional economy. Since 1967, the Bank of British Columbia has served that province and region well. I am sure there will be much disappointment that various circumstances, primarily economic, combined against the bank and left it vulnerable, facing at this time either closure or a restructuring. This speaks to the traditions of that bank. I think that the arrangements we are discussing tonight will ensure the future of the bank and will contribute to the future of British Columbia.

The Hongkong Bank of Canada is a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation. It began its operations as a Canadian chartered bank in 1981. As of October 1986 its assets exceeded $736 million. It is a worldwide bank. The Hongkong Bank group, which is headquartered in Hong Kong, had as of June 1986 assets of more than $108 billion. It is anchored in the Pacific Rim, active throughout the Asian countries, and has had more than a century of experience in financing international trade.

Honourable senators, this is a good connection for the Bank of British Columbia—a British Columbian bank which has aspirations to be active throughout the Pacific Rim. The new status of the Bank of British Columbia speaks to the future of that province and region as a major partner in trade and investment in the Pacific Rim. That is certainly the way the directors of the bank see it and it is emphatically the way the Government of British Columbia sees it. With their support, the Government of Canada is proposing this legislation. If this legislation passes, the bank will close tonight as the Bank of British Columbia and it will open tomorrow as the Bank of British Columbia, a division of the Hongkong Bank of Canada, a bank with a solid future in British Columbia and in the Pacific Rim.

I invite the Senate to pass this bill expeditiously so that the solid prospects now before the restructured bank can be realized.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, we have listened with interest to the Leader of the Government in the Senate providing the details of the bill, and I shall not proceed to go through those details again. I am not in any essential dispute with him as to the details. However, his attitude of virtually welcoming the banking development as a positive step makes one believe that he would read Macbeth as though it were high comedy.

Honourable senators, we are talking tonight about a substantial western tragedy; not a positive situation, as the Leader of the Government would suggest. May I make it clear at the outset that, together with what I believe to be most of my colleagues, I intend to vote for this measure because, despite its imperfections and despite what we might have wished to see—in other words, a Canadian purchaser, perhaps, or a western consortium—under the circumstances, and faced with the information from the government which we can only assume to be valid, the course of action represented by this proposed measure may be almost the only way to go. I can assure honourable senators that I have attended all of the meetings of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee under the able chairmanship of Senator Sinclair, and this solution can probably be best described as the “least bad” solution.

However, again, as over the past two years, we have seen the government's haphazard, crisis approach to a serious banking problem. Canadians, wherever they live, can only feel profound regret that once again a regional financial institution is suffering from a crisis of confidence. In this case it is another western bank and a very good one. Testimony provided full evidence that the Bank of British Columbia was being well managed. It was one of the best small "c" conservative financial institutions in the country and, yet, it has found it necessary to seek the assistance of governments and their agencies, and it has reached out in this case across the Pacific Ocean to an offshore bank. What a marvellous opportunity this is for the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, admittedly, a very respected worldwide institution—yesterday, its Canadian subsidiary was a small schedule B bank in Canada; tomorrow, through the back door and with the cooperation of the government—and I know it may have been inevitable and it may represent the best solution—the Hongkong Bank of Canada will become Canada's third largest schedule B bank—in effect, a schedule A bank, taking over for $200 million a Canadian schedule A bank. I say to you, honourable senators, it is nice if you can do it. Yet, we certainly wish them well as they set up in business with this new Bank of British Columbia subsidiary.

However, no one should raise their champagne glasses in celebration. Another western bank asks for the right to sell to a foreign institution because problems larger than itself have overwhelmed it. What further evidence is necessary for this government to realize that a vital region of Canada, one of Canada's great engines of growth, its western provinces, are in serious and, in some areas, grave economic difficulty?

The other day the Right Honourable the Prime Minister was in Toronto at that lavish, pheasant-under-glass, $250-a-plate fundraising dinner.

Senator Murray: Successful, too!

Senator Perrault: At that dinner the Prime Minister was saying how great things were in the country and how prosperity was returning. While the Prime Minister and those well-heeled guests were picking away at their gourmet delicacies, the people in the Atlantic provinces are facing some of the highest unemployment rates that they have faced in years and the people in western Canada are truly suffering; the "oil patch" is in complete disarray—forestry and mining are in trouble, and in the Northwest Territories every oil rig has been closed down. Yet, the Prime Minister portrays a sort of Tory Nero fiddling as the western provinces and Atlantic provinces burn, then raises a toast with that vintage champagne, saying how great things are in this country. I wish he would come out west a little more often and meet some of the real people.

Senator Murray: He was there last week.

Senator Perrault: We are told by the Prime Minister that the country is working itself out of a recession. He says that there is an increase in jobs, and refuses stubbornly to acknowledge that greater prosperity, if any, is confined to central Canada. Indeed, the most prosperous constituency in this country is his very own. There is a mini-boom in his riding, and Christmas has come early. The greatest prosperity of all will exist very shortly in the Prime Minister's own constituency where new airports and vast public works projects—despite the criticism of the Auditor General—are booming ahead.

There is little sympathy for the west. That was evidenced once again the other day by the decision to deny unfairly the province of Manitoba a contract which meant a great deal to that province. With depressed resource industries and other crises, it is no wonder that western financial institutions are under siege and assault. It is no wonder that they are floundering with the final push over the brink administered by a confused government which refuses to introduce any kind of new legislation governing our financial institutions.

If honourable senators will permit a bit of nostalgia, I was there that day in 1967 when the late W.A.C. Bennett opened the Bank of British Columbia. We disputed many, many things in the British Columbia legislature. I was Liberal leader there for nine years and I have the scars to prove it. However, we agreed on that one. Together with the provincial NDP, the Liberal and Social Credit parties, we agreed that it was time to establish regional financial institutions to look after the needs of the regions. We felt it was time to end this business of having to wire Montreal or Toronto for approval of loans of a few thousand dollars. The Bank of British Columbia was established in 1967 with great enthusiasm. That was Canada's centenary year, the beginning of what we hoped would be the second century of hope. All of us in British Columbia, regardless of party, saw in the establishment of this bank the leading edge of the aspirations of the people of our province. We were and have been very proud of it. Based in Vancouver, the bank was soon to become a feisty, useful, effective institution which shook up the entire banking establishment.

The Bank of British Columbia expanded and grew. Its number of branches increased. The entire banking climate on the west coast was improved substantially, proving among other things the value of competition. In order to give you some idea of the bank and the way in which it operated, I would remind you of some testimony that we heard one year ago today. One year ago today, Edgar Kaiser of the Bank of British Columbia testified in Ottawa and he said:

There is therefore no fundamental reason to believe that a regional institution cannot be successful.

Those are hollow words now.

If we take our own institution, only ten months ago our institution was very highly leveraged, over 40:1, with a large base of non-performing real estate assets and having something in the order of just under 2,000 shareholders. Today we find ourselves leveraged at only 13:1—of over $3 billion Canadian or, say, over $2 billion American, the least leveraged bank in all of North America, the most conservatively leveraged institution of over $2 billion or more in size, with slightly over 14,000 shareholders based in western Canada and with that equity financed by Canadians not only in western Canada but across the country. The predominance of those shareholders are small ones, less than 100 shares.

That is the kind of institution that we need in this country, and you do not celebrate when institutions of that kind go down the tube. Thousands of investing Canadians could lose their money. This was a well run institution, as was emphasized today in the hearings once again. The loans have been carefully supervised, and the bank has been the victim of cruel circumstances. What were the circumstances? I suggest, honourable senators, that the circumstances were the product of the thoroughly botched banking policy of this government. At the beginning of last year the Bank of British Columbia was one of the more conservative financial institutions in the country. But what happened? The fragile quality of confidence was shattered.

● (1910)

Honourable senators know our position regarding the way the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank issues were handled. The banks were very badly mismanaged to begin with; but the way the government handled those crises led to the current instability in the banking system. What a litany for this government to consider at its two-year point, as the custodians of national government in this country. The Canadian Commercial Bank went into bankruptcy in September 1985. The Northland Bank went into bankruptcy in September 1985; the Mercantile Bank merged at the end of 1985 with the Banque Nationale; Morguard Bank merged at the end of 1985 with the Security Pacific Bank, a wholly-owned subsidiary of a U.S. financial holding company. The Continental Bank merged in October 1985 with Lloyds of London. The Bank of British Columbia right now is merging, in November 1986, with the Bank of Hongkong.

This transaction leaves the tiny Western and Pacific Bank and the Bank of Alberta the only Canadian chartered banks west of Toronto—and this is western development!

Honourable senators, the government has made a botch of its banking policy. It made two errors which set off a chain of banking disasters. When the Minister of Finance and the predecessor of the Minister of State for Finance brought the bail-out package to Parliament, we asked whether or not the bail-out package was sufficient. We were assured that it was, but it turned out that the ministers and officials had not bothered to look at the books of the Canadian Commercial Bank. The arrangement was clearly insufficient. On the basis of what the Minister of Finance, the Governor of the Bank and the predecessor of the Minister of State for Finance told us, people continued to deposit money in those banks as well as in the Continental Bank and the Bank of British Columbia—because they believed their government; and they have a right to be able to believe their government.

In September of 1985 we remember all too well that it was found that the package was inadequate and that the government had misrepresented to Parliament and to the Canadian people the viability and solvency of those two banks. As a result of that lack of confidence—and this is the whole essence of the problem with the Bank of British Columbia, namely, an erosion of confidence—both the Continental Bank and the Bank of British Columbia have had repeated difficulties in persuading other banks, large corporations and credit unions to maintain deposits.

One can appreciate that a crisis of confidence would arise. The treasurer of major organizations, a town council or a municipality has fiduciary roles to play. He or she must protect the money of his or her shareholders or taxpayers. Therefore, both banks, the Continental and the Bank of British Columbia, had a difficult time persuading other banks and depositors to stay with them.

Government ministers will claim that they did their best, and I think that within their capabilities they did. The fact is that they did not know what they were doing when they brought in the original bail-out package for the Canadian Commercial Bank. In addition, those facts were misrepresented to the Canadian people and to Parliament between March and September. Mr. Justice Estey confirmed that the bail-out was an amateur-night effort and that it was insufficient. He confirmed also that the two banks had not been solvent.

Today's crisis is related directly to the government's bungling of the western bank crises of a few months ago. The government's mismanagement has created trouble for all small institutions; it has caused loss of investor and depositor confidence, loss of prestige and damage to reputation. People do not know where this government is going. The Bank of B.C. was a sound and well managed institution before the CCB bail-out. Its troubles began afterwards.

What effect did the botch-up of the Northland Bank and the Canadian Commercial Bank have on the Bank of British Columbia? I quote from a news release that was issued yesterday, to explain this proposed deal:

... in late 1985 when the board of directors of BBC concluded that BBC, like a number of other smaller Canadian banks, would have difficulty recovering from the loss of confidence that followed the events then taking place in the banking system and that the time for recovery might be unacceptably long.

There is the beginning of it, because of the way that crisis was handled a few months ago we have the bill before us, and we warned that new crises of this kind could well be the result.

This is yet another crisis of confidence with another "Perils of Pauline" solution by the government, this time in the form of a sale of assets of the Bank of British Columbia to the Hongkong Bank of Canada, a schedule "B" bank. It is true that the parent bank is one of the world's largest and best managed. The headquarters of the new subsidiary of the bank will be in Vancouver, and thus we understand that the executive direction of the Bank of B.C. division of the new bank will be maintained in Vancouver. This provides at least some solace for the regional aspirations of British Columbians. There will be at least one banking institution of reasonable size with a head office in the westernmost province. The employees of the Bank of B.C., some 1,400 in number, will, we are advised, have continuing employment assured. Perhaps the Leader of the Government will wish to provide further assurances on that point.

Members of the Banking Committee have been assured that 39 branches of the bank will continue to be open for the time being. The effects of the bill will obviously be of some assistance to the employees and will assure some 200,000 depositors of the safety of their funds; and, yes, the shareholders will be limited to either approving or disapproving the amount of the deal, but not the deal itself, and it is conceivable that the final CDIC payment, as we learned in committee, could run over $200 million, depending on what the shareholders decide at their meeting, and should an assessor be required to determine a final figure.

But the whole thing is without doubt an admission of incompetence on the part of the government. It is one more example of the state of complete disarray of the government's policies, especially where banks are concerned; and, as I said earlier, it reflects the utter chaos that we have in that area.

As ingenious and inventive as this proposal is, the sad fact is that it is ad hoc legislation being introduced in a policy vacuum. Since coming into power—indeed, swept into power with that overwhelming majority across the country—the Tory government has promised new comprehensive legislation to regulate Canadian financial institutions. Although the need is becoming more and more obvious, this government still has no legislation in place. I know that they promise it. They say, "Just wait a while." Meanwhile, one more institution after another goes down the tube. There has been no policy on ownership of financial institutions, no strengthening of the supervisory structures. Ad hockery is the policy.

Time and time again the government is putting itself into a position of governing on a case-by-case basis—and that is just like playing Russian roulette. That is not leadership. That is not the quality of government that Canadians expect and deserve. No wonder that the Conservatives are plummeting in the polls.

We on this side of the house are very concerned about Canadians as depositors, employees and shareholders. In this case, we regret deeply the circumstances that have caused a good, well-managed western regional financial institution to pass under foreign control. We have been advised that there is urgency to have this measure dealt with by Parliament; that a withdrawal of deposits might ensue if we do not deal with this rapidly; that it could cause further difficulties. We have heard many witnesses in committee, and all of them have emphasized that a time factor exists. We appreciate that urgency may well exist, but we cannot forget March of 1985 and the bail-out package presented to us then. We were misled then, in both chambers of Parliament. Let us hope that the bill before us at least represents a degree of competence considerably better than the ad hockery of 1985.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I heard the Bank of British Columbia described by my distinguished colleague as "feisty." I have never been associated with a feisty bank, and I do not know that I want to. In any event, I believe that all of us who heard the evidence presented yesterday evening and today cannot help but feel very sorry and upset that another of our financial institutions has been unable to continue in the way it was conceived. This did not happen overnight. I think the evidence clearly demonstrates that the Department of Finance, the Inspector General of Banks and the ministers did learn from some of the problems that they dealt with a year ago concerning the banks in Alberta. There was for some considerable period of time a hands-on treatment of events as they developed.

This bank was certainly not viable. To say it was essentially "insolvent" may be too harsh, and perhaps a softer word would be justified. In our report we say that it was "not viable," and there is no question that the viability of the Bank of British Columbia was on a very slender thread. We were told that even though for the first three quarters there was a profit, the year as a whole would show a loss and that 1987 was not looking good. However, it did disturb us that, notwithstanding that, these common shareholders were going to walk away with somewhere between $60 million and $100 million. They would be receiving something that would be bound to be reflected, in an indirect way, against the revenues of the Government of Canada. The minister today acknowledged in an indirect way that additional costs would be put on the financial institutions and that would be reflected in the moneys that the government would collect through taxation. Honourable senators, that is point number one.

Point number two is, I think, an extremely important one. The chairman of the CDIC put it rather well, in my opinion. He said that they were concerned, in regard to this matter, that they did not pay twice. By that he meant that he did not want to put up this $200 million and then at a later date have to bail out the insured depositors again.

Therefore, as part of the deal—and in writing—there is a commitment by the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation to maintain, absolutely, all the requirements of capitalization under the Bank Act of its subsidiary, the Hongkong Bank of Canada. While today the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation does guarantee in writing the deposits of its subsidiary, that agreement will be modified to cover also the deposits of the Bank of British Columbia subdivision of the Hongkong Bank of Canada.

What we have are legally enforceable attributes to make sure—as nearly as we can—that there will not be another call.

I would sincerely like to thank the Minister of Finance for appearing before us. In the presence of Senator Murray, the Leader of the Government in this chamber, he gave us the assurance that so far as he could he was accepting the responsibility of saying that this bank was now in good shape and could go forward. I hope that in closing this debate the Leader of the Government will be able to give this chamber his similar assurances.

The third point I wish to make relates to something that bothers me greatly, and that is the use of what I call a "legal statute."

Section 273 of the Bank Act, which has been in place since 1980, was never meant—and I am certain it was never contemplated—to be used by these schedule B banks which have great advantages in regard to nationality and great advantages as to concentration. It was not contemplated that it would be used to take over banks that were subject to very strict limitations, namely, 10 per cent ownership by one person or group and 25 per cent in aggregate by foreign interests. That section was never meant to be utilized to, in effect, circumvent these very important limitations. It seems to me to be a tragedy.

We have in our banking institutions in this country a national asset, one that I am proud of and one that I am hopeful all senators are proud of. I think Canadians should be proud of that. I think they deserve protection. I do not like the idea that because of unusual circumstances—and I admit they certainly were unusual—this limitation on nationality and this limitation on concentration should be circumvented.

Honourable senators, in the force and thrust of problems in the banking world where confidence is so important, sometimes very unusual and difficult steps have to be taken and sometimes unfortunate ones. I certainly hope that government minds will be directed to these problems. That is why I will include the observations made in the committee's report in a motion, so that when the matter goes to the other place, they will be reported upon.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Murray speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Murray:—I have no difficulty at all in associating myself with the statements made to the committee this afternoon by my colleague the Minister of Finance to the effect that, so far as any of us can be expected to judge these matters, the restructuring that is under way with this bank will leave the bank in very good shape, indeed—solvent and with the support of a very strong bank with an excellent track record and with excellent international connections. To that I can only add the statement made last night before the committee by the Governor of the Bank of Canada who said, "I support this solution very much. I think it is the best one available."

I want to thank the chairman of the committee and Senator Perrault for their comments in the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill. I have a few comments I wish to add before we proceed, as I hope we will, to third reading and passage of this bill.

● (1930)

Senator Perrault evoked in his opening remarks the possibility, as if it had been a live one, of some alternative arrangement by which the Bank of British Columbia might have been taken over by a Canadian purchaser or, as he put it, "a western consortium."

For the record, I should point out that the evidence before the committee was that that alternative was simply not on. Mr. Parker, the Chief Executive Officer of the Bank of British Columbia, told the committee that while they had had discussions with at least 20 institutions, both international and local, some of those discussions had not continued for any great period of time and that in the end serious discussions narrowed down to two alternatives, the VanCity Credit Union and the Hongkong Bank of Canada.

I quote the statement of Mr. Parker which he made before the committee today:

We continued discussions with the VanCity Credit Union, but I think senators will appreciate that that institution is highly leveraged in its own right. While we did not discontinue negotiations, I believe that VanCity had difficulty coming to us with a feasible proposal.

So, it was obvious, I think, that under the pressures of time that the directors of the bank faced, the proposal from the Hongkong Bank of Canada was not only the better alternative available but, in the context of those time pressures, was the only one short of liquidation of the bank.

The honourable senator has spoken of this as a marvellous opportunity for the Hongkong Bank of Canada. I regret the necessity of having to take the action that we are taking, and I regret the fact, as Senator Sinclair has said, that the Bank of British Columbia will not be able to continue in the way originally conceived for it, but the fact of the matter is that there is here a good opportunity for the Bank of British Columbia to be connected with a bank that has strong international connections. This is an important step to protect the jobs of 1300 employees of the Bank of British Columbia who keep the branches of that bank in operation and to protect the interests of the depositors and the other customers of that bank.

Senator Perrault has reproached the government for what he has termed a "botched banking policy." The policy and the structure that we have been working with is the one that we inherited.

Senator Perrault: You said you were going to change it.

Senator Murray: Yes, and I will get to that in a moment. The senator raised, of course, the business of the Canadian Commercial Bank, which was debated in this place before. I do not want to cover that ground again, as he took such relish in doing, but I think it should be stated for the record that what the government faced one weekend last year was the prospect of closing that Alberta bank on a Monday morning, on the one hand, and an alternative presented to the government by the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Inspector General of Banks, two provinces and the five big commercial banks of this country. The government was told by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, supported by the Inspector General of Banks and by spokesmen for the five big commercial banks, that if that bank were allowed to go down without any attempt being made to save it, that would have international repercussions for Canada and there would be a "domino effect" at that time.

That being the case, the government was told there was an alternative; the alternative was to put up $60 million and to get two of the provinces involved and the five big commercial banks involved in a rescue attempt. At that time the government took the decision that I think any responsible or sensible person would have taken, which was to say, "Mount the rescue package. Try to keep the bank going."

I may say that, notwithstanding the comments that the honourable senator has made tonight and his efforts and those of his colleagues in the other place to hang on to some phrase, some clause, some paragraph in the Estey report, the fact of the matter is that Mr. Justice Estey had no fault to find with the ministers who were responsible for the Department of Finance at that time.

We are bringing in new legislation, and the important thing, it seems to me, since we have undertaken to do it in the course of this session, is not whether it came in last week or the week before, or this week or next week, but that it should be done right, bearing in mind the importance of this to our country. The government brought in a green paper early in its term of office. Hearings have been held by the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and by the Banking Committee of the other place.

Senator Perrault: There are only two western banks to go.

Senator Murray: We have had a report from the Economic Council of Canada. The Ontario government has had its own task force under Stefan Dupre study the matter, and these reports are in.

This weekend Mr. Hockin, the Minister of State for Finance, will meet with his counterparts from the provinces and we will be ready to bring in new legislation shortly, and it will be done right and it will serve this country and its financial institutions, which are so important to the functioning of our economy and are such winners. The financial service industry can be such a winner for us in international markets. I say that the legislation we will be bringing in shortly will serve this country very well into the next century.

Honourable senators, Senator Sinclair has pointed out that the provisions of the agreement are, as he put it, legally enforceable, that there are legally-enforceable provisions to ensure that there will not be another call on the federal treasury, and that is a correct statement of the situation.

On that basis, I have no hesitation in commending this bill to the Senate as a measure that will give this bank, which has had such difficulty recently, a new lease on life and open up to this bank new prospects so that it can make a valuable contribution to the economy of British Columbia and to the western region.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Senator Murray.]

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

MOTION RE MESSAGE TO HOUSE OF COMMONS ADOPTED

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator van Roggen:

That the Message which is to be sent to the House of Commons with Bill C-27, An Act to facilitate the continuation of the business of the Bank of British Columbia, contain the following observations appearing in the Sixth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, as follows:

"Under the arrangement involving the purchase of the BBC by the Hongkong Bank of Canada, the HK Bank will buy virtually all assets and assume virtually all liabilities of the BBC for $200 million from CDIC. In return, the HK Bank of Canada will pay $63.5 million to the shareholders of the BBC. In effect, therefore, the HK Bank of Canada was paid $136.5 million in order to buy the BBC. The Committee's examination left partly unanswered the question of why BBC's shareholders are to receive $63.5 million plus additional recoveries from the liquidation of assets retained by BBC which may bring the total compensation to nearly $100 million, when the BBC, as evidenced by the CDIC advance to its purchaser was not viable.

As part of the purchase agreement, the Hongkong Bank of Canada assumed all the outstanding deposit liabilities of the BBC. According to testimony received by the Committee, the HK Bank's parent, the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, in a letter of commitment to the Inspector General of Banks, has undertaken to:

a) guarantee all of the deposits of its subsidiary, andL/Eb) ensure that its subsidiary will remain sufficiently capitalized to meet all of its obligations under the Bank Act.

The agreement between the BBC and HK Bank of Canada entails in essence the takeover of a schedule A bank by a bank under schedule B of the Bank Act. Provisions in the Bank Act limit share ownership in a schedule A bank to 10% for any single individual or group and to 25% for foreign investors in the aggregate. The agreement therefore, by using section 273 of the Bank Act, in effect circumvents the limitation on ownership and on nationality contained in the Bank Act."

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8.20 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA

THE SECRETARY TO THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

27 November 1986

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 27th day of November, 1986, at 8:25 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

Yours sincerely,
Léopold H. Amyot
Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when I move the adjournment motion, I will propose that the Senate adjourn until Tuesday, December 16, at 2 p.m. We have no legislation before us at the present time as we have dealt with what legislation we had before us, and it does not appear likely that there will be any legislation moving through the pipeline during the next short while. The most efficient use of the Senate's time and of senators' time, it appears to me and to others, is the system that we have been using since this session began. That is, to allow the committees to continue with the pre-study of bills while the Senate itself does not sit. This, of course, entails almost as many, if not as many, senators as would be engaged in the activities of the Senate, though we do not actually go through the formality of having the Senate sit.

To that end, and to give honourable senators some idea of the amount of work that there is before Senate committees now for pre-study, I would like to give you the names of the bills and the committees to which they have been referred. Bill C-2, the Canagrex bill, has been referred to the Agriculture Committee. Bills C-3 and C-4, amending the Radio Act and the Railway Act respectively, have both been referred to the Transport and Communications Committee. Bill C-12, the Prairie Grain Advance Payments bill, has been referred to the Agriculture Committee. Bill C-13, the Bell Canada Reorganization bill, has been referred to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, and Bill C-15 is in the hands of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. Bill C-16, the UIC bill, has been referred to the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee.

In addition, honourable senators, today we referred for pre-study Bill C-7, the Archives of Canada bill, to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. There is Bill C-21, which exempts certain shipping conference practices from the Competition Act. Bill C-23, dealing with the Income Tax Act, has been referred to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. Bill C-25, which deals with divestiture of Canadair, has also been referred to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. The bill dealing with the Coastal Fisheries Act has been referred to the Fisheries Committee.

In addition, honourable senators, the Foreign Affairs Committee is busily preparing its report, and the National Finance Committee is working on its report on the federal government's involvement in post-secondary education. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments is scheduled to have its first meeting next week. Senator Kelly's committee on terrorism is starting on the right foot. I notice that he has begun to terrorize his committee already, that he is starting at 10 o'clock on Monday morning and working all day and that he is doing the same thing the following Friday. On Tuesday of next week the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m., the Foreign Affairs Committee at 1 o'clock, the sub-committee of the Internal Economy Committee on classification of salaries is meeting at 10 o'clock, the Fisheries Committee on budgets at 12 noon and the Internal Economy Committee again at 12 noon.

Senator Frith: The Internal Economy sub-committee is meeting at 12 o'clock and the main committee is meeting at 2 o'clock.

Senator Doody: Yes. On Wednesday the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is meeting at 2 o'clock, the Official Languages Committee is meeting at 3.30 and the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee at a time to be set. On Thursday the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is meeting at 3.30 p.m., the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee is meeting at 4 o'clock, Regulations and other Statutory Instruments is meeting at 11 o'clock and, as I said, the committee on terrorism will be meeting all day Friday. So, honourable senators, as you can see we have a full schedule for committees. I would add that when we get back, we will have before us the supply bill, supplementary estimates (A), which was studied last night by the National Finance Committee. Of course, we are always under the constraints of rule 14A, which allows the Speaker to call us back in the event of an emergency. I do not see anything on the agenda that would give me any indication that such an emergency might arise.

As you can see, the committee calendar is quite full whereas the calendar for the Senate itself is quite empty. With that in mind, and with the work schedule ahead of us, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g):

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, 16th December, 1986, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Acting Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to facilitate the continuation of the business of the Bank of British Columbia (Bill C-27, Chapter 47, 1986)

An Act to implement conventions between Canada and the Kingdom of the Netherlands and Canada and Japan and agreements between Canada and the People's Republic of China and Canada and the Republic of Malta for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax (Bill S-2, Chapter 48, 1986)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

● (2030)

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 16, 1986, at 2 p.m.

12. amounts to the exercise of a substantive legislative power properly the subject of direct parliamentary enactment;

13. is defective in its drafting or for any other reason, requires elucidation as to its form or purport.

Your Committee recommends that its quorum be fixed at four (4) members, provided that both Houses are represented whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings to receive and authorize the printing of evidence so long as three (3) members are present, provided that both Houses are represented; and, that the Committee have power to engage the services of such staff, and such stenographic and clerical staff as may be required.

Your Committee further recommends that it be empowered to sit during sittings and ajournments of the Senate.

Respectfully submitted,

NATHAN NURGITZ
Joint Chairman

THE LATE HONOURABLE JEAN-PAUL DESCHATELETS, P.C.

TRIBUTES

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): Honourable senators, it is with deep regret that I must announce the death last Thursday of our former colleague, the Honourable Jean-Paul Deschatelets.

Throughout a long and honourable political career, Jean-Paul Deschatelets was among our most respected and best loved parliamentarians. He had earned the respect not only of his colleagues but also of his constituents in a working-class riding in Montreal, where he was elected five times between 1953 and his resignation in 1965.

In that year, one of the Montreal newspapers described Mr. Deschatelets and his wife as follows:

To many poor people, Deschatelets is almost a god and Mrs. Deschatelets generosity personified. Both have hearts of gold.

In 1963, Jean-Paul Deschatelets became a member of cabinet as Minister of Public Works. Prime Minister Pearson also made him Minister responsible for Expo 67. This was a favourite project into which he put his heart and soul, with tremendous dedication.

On many occasions, and especially as Speaker of the Senate from 1968 to 1972, Senator Deschatelets earned the admiration, confidence and respect of his colleagues. He was a courtly and cultivated gentleman with a thorough knowledge of our history, who knew when and how to intervene in debate.

I remember well his speeches during the constitutional debate in 1981. His comments at the time reflected not only his intellectual and political honesty but also a certain concept of Canada and Canadian federalism, a concept he maintained throughout his political career.

In March 1981, he gave in this chamber his vision of Canada, and I quote:

Outside our boundaries, there is but one flag, the Canadian flag, which we are so proud to see in foreign countries, but in Canada, here is another sight to think about, the beautiful sight, at federal-provincial conferences, of eleven flags unfurled in the background side by side, first the Canadian flag followed by the flags of each province according to its date of entry in the Federation. That, for me, is the true symbol of Canada.

Today, honourable senators, we remember the dedication of Jean-Paul Deschatelets, his humanist outlook and his integrity that both Houses of Parliament were privileged to experience.

Speaking on behalf of Prime Minister Mulroney and the Government, I want to offer my condolences to his wife and members of his family.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it is not long since members of the Senate rose to mark the retirement of the late Senator Deschatelets from the Senate. On that occasion a number of senators paid tribute to his long and distinguished political career and to his personal attributes of courtesy, eloquence, independence and generosity which he possessed in such abundance. Indeed, among those who paid tribute to his career was Senator Roblin who expressed the wish that he would enjoy a long and interesting retirement. Unfortunately, that wish—which was shared by all members of the Senate—was not realized and today we are mourning the death of Senator Deschatelets and paying tribute to his memory.

As has been mentioned by Senator Murray, Mr. Deschatelets entered the House of Commons after the June election of 1953. There were a large number of new members elected in 1953, including the late Senator Deschatelets and myself, and we both found ourselves freshmen backbenchers in support of the government of the late Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent. Mr. Deschatelets survived through all of the subsequent elections and, following the general election of 1963, was appointed Minister of Public Works by Prime Minister Pearson and served in that capacity for several years. As a member of Parliament representing a large coastal constituency, I came to appreciate the consideration which Mr. Deschatelets, in his capacity as Minister of Public Works, showed to such members of Parliament. Indeed, in my own former constituency, I have frequently referred to the impact which the late Senator Deschatelets made in improving a number of very important public works.

Therefore, honourable senators, it is with very real appreciation and nostalgia that I join with others in paying tribute to the late Senator Deschatelets. As has been pointed out, he was a genial, courteous and human person with a sense of humour who greatly relished the combative aspects of politics. I join with Senator Murray in expressing the sympathy of my colleagues to his widow and his family.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, even though it is odious to quote yourself, especially with approval, I shall do so, but I will provide an explanation beforehand. I shall be quoting the comments I made in the Senate, as already mentioned by senator MacEachen, on January 21, 1986.

After my intervention on that day, Senator Deschatelets who was with us at the time, had the kindness to send me a short note of thanks. Unfortunately, he is no longer with us and he will never be able to read what we are saying today. Since what I had said on January 21, 1986, had received his approval, I would like to repeat it today. These comments still apply on this most sad of occasions. As I said at the time:

He has been missed, and he will continue to be missed on both the senatorial and the Canadian political scene.

Hon. Jean Le Moyné: Honourable senators, I would like to express my feelings at the loss of Senator Deschatelets.

I met him in 1925, at the Collège Sainte-Marie, where we began our education together. We lost touch with each other after graduation, but I continued to follow and admire his career from afar.

Four years ago, when I came to the Senate, I was most happy to see him again. My happiness was short-lived because he was already suffering from an illness which he hid from us with truly heroic discretion.

I would like to say that we often joked about his absences or the fact that he did not always join us. He always took it very well and his discretion was constantly being confirmed.

I therefore wish to express my sorrow and offer my most sincere condolences to his family.

Hon. Renaude Lapointe: Honourable senators, there are very strange coincidences in life. At the very moment when I am about to leave the Senate, the one who opened its doors for me with such kindness as its Speaker 15 years ago and who afterwards provided me with affectionate guidance has just left this world.

Yesterday I attended the funeral service for Senator Deschatelets with Senators Riel and Denis at the Montreal Cathedral. After the ceremony, I paid him, with very little preparation, a modest but sincere homage on behalf of all Canadians who knew him during his active period and of those in the Commons and the Senate who benefited from his experience, his assistance and his friendship.

At the same time, I expressed to the members of his family on your behalf our sincere regrets and the assurance that he will be remembered by all of us.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I would be remiss if I did not take this opportunity to comment briefly on the death of Senator Deschatelets.

I got to know him in the House of Commons where I sat with him for several years. I always admired his extremely objective approach when he would rise to debate legislation under study in the House of Commons.

Today I should like to commend his nationalism. Jean-Paul Deschatelets was a true Quebecer, torn apart by the problems Quebec had in its relations with the central government. This was no more obvious than on the day when, in this house, he voiced his circumstantial opposition during the debate on the repatriation of the Constitution. Deep within himself his conscience was telling him that he could not accept the fact that Quebec would be cast aside in the constitutional repatriation process.

Jean-Paul Deschatelets was a good parliamentarian, a man who came well prepared for debates and who did extensive research on the various issues raised in Parliament. As somebody pointed out earlier, he was Speaker of the Senate. I think all Canadians can recall how dedicated he was in protecting the interests of this institution, the Senate.

Honourable senators, the Senate will always treasure fond memories of the presence of Jean-Paul Deschatelets in Canada's Parliament. To his family, I extend my most sincere condolences.

THE REVEREND FATHER LUCIEN LARRE, O.C.

RECIPIENT OF THÉRÈSE CASGRAIN AWARD—FELICITATIONS

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I rise to draw the attention of this chamber to the great honour that has been bestowed on the Reverend Father Lucien Larre, O.C., of Bosco Homes of Regina. He has been chosen to receive the coveted Thérèse Casgrain Award, which was established six years ago in tribute to this eminent Canadian for her contribution to social reform in Canada. The award is presented annually to two Canadians, a man and a woman, whose pioneer spirit, social commitment and persistent endeavours have contributed significantly to the advancement of a social cause and the well-being of their fellow Canadians. The other recipient of this important award is Dr. Norah Christine Browne of St. John's, Newfoundland.

As honourable senators will recognize, the Thérèse Casgrain Award follows on an almost annual series of recognitions and honours paid to Father Larre for his outstanding contribution as a founder of Bosco Homes to work with severely emotionally disturbed children and youths. He is the recipient of no less than six national humanitarian awards. Besides his theological studies, he has five additional university degrees to his credit in education, in philosophy and psychology and masters degrees in history and in education and counselling from the University of Ottawa.

His career spans that of a scholar, educator, a university lecturer, a psychiatric researcher, a popular and notable speaker and national lecturer and, most importantly, as the renowned founder and psychotherapist of the eight residential Bosco homes for emotionally disturbed young people.

Father Larre was born the youngest of 13 children in St. Walburg in northern Saskatchewan. His father died when he was three months old and little Lucien contracted severe poliomyelitis at the age of five. He heard the doctors tell his weeping mother that he would never walk again, but Lucien determined he would and within two and half years he could. He still has a severe limp.

Blushingly, he has admitted that his mother sent him to St. Thomas College for further training. As he said, she could only speak French, but she was able to ascertain that his hanging around the pool halls in St. Walburg was not the proper way for him to grow up. He went to this classical college and prep school for priests in North Battleford, where he learned to hate Latin. Later in his life he was obliged to teach this same subject at the St. Thomas school, mercifully only for a short time. He ultimately entered the faculty of arts and joined the Oblate order in North Battleford. He struggled with and conquered the problems of regimentation, conformity, and the hardest of all, as he says, silence.

Father Larre longed for creativity. He was ultimately ordained an Oblate father in 1958, and he found his creative outlet in teaching music in Medicine Hat and in teaching drama to high school students in clubs in Red Deer. Despite his disability, he became an Air Force chaplain with, as he says, "almost all of the privileges of being a captain." His aptitude for and attitude towards young people led to an appointment as a guidance counsellor at the new Miller Comprehensive High School in Regina in 1967, where he encountered many children—"kids", as he says—with severe emotional problems. Within a year he set up a whole treatment centre for disturbed children, many of whom had had repeated short admissions to the psychiatric wards of a nearby hospital.

By 1970 Father Larre's observations led him and others to establish the first Bosco Home and Treatment Centre for teenagers with severe emotional problems. Today there are eight such residential houses in Regina. There is also a special school and a treatment centre with his own unique program of therapy and support.

This program has worked well for teenagers at all levels, of all races and of all creeds from all over western Canada—boys and girls who have been rejects and failures from normal psychotherapy programs established in other institutions. It has worked well for severely disturbed youngsters from broken families, battered and sexually abused children, those addicted to drugs and alcohol, suicidal youths and youngsters with early or established criminal records.

The basis of the program is love and understanding, of caring and support until the resentment and rebellion is replaced by confidence and trust, until the barriers to communication have been broken down and a relationship has been established which becomes the bridge to therapy and return to normalcy.

The program involves living with these children full time in a balanced, loving environment where they can feel safe and respected, secure and understood in an atmosphere of family living until trust can be established.

This is done by living together in a household environment with two highly trained young people acting as parents and with a live-in trained director in each home. All are highly trained and motivated people, mostly in their twenties. The kids have their own established schedules in the homes. They learn to look after their household themselves and they regain some self-esteem at this level.

When the barriers are broken down and trust established, their professional psychotherapy, schooling and further training in skills and trades is undertaken. Eventually they are integrated into a normal world with an established sense of self-worth. Group therapy in an almost family type of environment is conducted for five hours each week.

The work is hard and is done, virtually, with a one-on-one approach. Young people are now referred by social agencies, by governments and by schools.

The intensity of care is exemplified by the statistics. There are 12 teachers following the Government of Saskatchewan educational curriculum for a maximum of 50 students. Usually one teacher can handle only about four boys or girls. There are eight to ten children living in each home.

Sports activities, which include golf, curling, skiing and canoeing, are equally intensified. Father Larre says that sports relieves tension and that the work in sports makes miracles. Father Larre has said, "Those kids have only experienced failure in their lives and our motto is to feed them success at any cost."

What are the results for these most disturbed children? Bosco homes are said to have an 80 per cent success rate which, recognizing that so many of these are previously failed cases, is remarkable.

The success story of Bosco is a triumph of faith and love by a humble and self-effacing priest who has overcome all resistance and difficulties because of his involvement, his initiative and his commitment to helping adolescents with serious emotional problems and their families.

You can well imagine, honourable senators, that there was considerable resistance and local concern in the district where the first Bosco home was established. However, I think it is safe to say today that Father Larre's success and sincerity has overcome that and earned the respect of all about him.

The history of Bosco homes is really the story of Father Larre; one man's sensitivity and dedication. It is a story that was so beautifully told on our CBC program "Man Alive", with Roy Bonisteel, in a two-part documentary a few years ago. It is a history of faith, vision, initiative, humour and love, as touching and as moving as A Christmas Carol by Charles Dickens. I sincerely hope that some day someone will write the true life story of Bosco homes and Father Larre. As Carole Hill said in an article, it is a story of "the reverence for life and the belief that all his children shall succeed."

The name Bosco was taken from one of Father Larre's favourite saints. St. John Bosco was a resourceful, Salesian priest working the streets of Turin, who maintained that living with disturbed children was the key to helping them—a philosophy of proper parenting as followed by the Bosco homes.

The financing and funding of Bosco homes is deserving of a book of its own. Originally, it was very difficult. The resourcefulness and determination of Father Larre overcame that. The Government of Saskatchewan saw Bosco homes as a duplication of its own service, and neither the government nor the diocese of Regina would get financially involved.

So, the father made his first down payment for a Bosco home out of his own pocket. He gave $1,000 as payment by borrowing it from a bank. For that he pledged his 1964 Pontiac as collateral—a car which he did not own and which, in fact, belonged to the Oblate Fathers. He then required the next $15,000 as cash to the mortgage within a couple of weeks.

The Sunday before it was due, worried and restless, he lay down to sleep and to think out his problem. He said, "Sleep was a great healer to me." An unknown lady came to the door and asked for him, saying that her sister was in serious trouble and would he come. The tired but devoted father went and spent several hours with the girl. On leaving, the original lady who called him thanked him and said to Father Larre, "Is there anything that I can do for you, father?" He replied, jokingly, "Yes, I need $15,000 by tomorrow to pay for a home that I plan to purchase." The lady immediately took out her cheque book, wrote a cheque for $15,000, and gave it to him. Only later did he discover that the lady was the Mother General of the Sisters of St. Joseph of the United States.

It is episodes like that that illustrate the fortuitous and fascinating methods of financing that he used. Today Bosco homes is partially funded on behalf of the children by the referring social agencies, the social service of the province, psychiatric service, Indian Affairs and school boards. There is some support from voluntary donations and from religious groups, but there is a tremendous shortfall.

In order to raise funds for Bosco homes, this resourceful man of the cloth and his staff stage a Big Valley Jamboree every July in Craven, Saskatchewan. Craven is a small village in the Lumsden Valley, about 20 miles north of Regina. It has become the largest country music festival in Canada and attracts up to 80,000 visitors and tourists for the three-day period to hear the best known names in country music on this continent.

In the same location they stage a Big Valley Rodeo in the spring and a Big Valley Roundup in the fall. This has become by far the biggest chuck wagon race meet in the world, far exceeding the number of chuck wagons and competitors at the Calgary Stampede. To each of those events, more than 25,000 visitors are attracted.

Honourable senators can understand from my few words that I have only touched on Father Larre's accomplishments and character, and why I have such a deep admiration for the life and work of this outstanding and renowned priest. That is why I draw to your attention the worthiness of his selection as one of this year's recipients of the Thérèse Casgrain award. He is truly a humanitarian of whom all Canada may be proud.

I have taken the following from an article written by Mrs. Carol Hill of Regina, from whom I have borrowed quite liberally for my remarks:

[Senator Barootes.]

As the fox said in The Little Prince, "it is only with the heart that one can see rightly. What is essential is invisible to the eye."

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, as one who comes from Saskatchewan, from the same area as Senator Barootes, I wish to associate myself with the eloquent and comprehensive tribute paid to Father Larre. In our part of the country we sometimes feel that it is very difficult to become prominent on the national scene. Sometimes we feel rather overlooked, meagre and inadequate. But perhaps when it comes to dealing with people's emotions and welfare—and in the medical field, where Senator Barootes has distinguished himself for many years—Saskatchewan and Regina can claim to be among the leaders in Canada.

I have had the privilege to be associated in a small way with the tremendous effort put forward by Father Larre, and I can say that he has support from people of all religious denominations and all political parties. I believe he is widely recognized for the tremendous work that he is doing.

Senator Barootes referred to the Big Valley Jamboree—a creation of Father Larre—a big powwow, a gala event over a period of three days. It is my understanding that it attracts to one place the largest crowds in North America, to participate in a western and country music jamboree.

I wish to associate myself with all that Senator Barootes has said, and also with his reference to Mrs. Carol Hill who takes a prominent role in promoting an improvement in the lives of emotionally disturbed, handicapped and underprivileged people. The tribute paid by Senator Barootes is a valuable use of the facilities and time of the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

(For text of report, see Appendix "F", p. 323)

Senator Leblanc (Saurel): Honourable senators, the report is quite extensive and has already been made available to senators present in this house so that they may have a look at it before it is tabled and discussed.

Briefly, the committee wants to put forward some representations. When it recently examined the Supplementary Estimates (A), the new Treasury Board Secretary, Mr. Gérard Veilleux, who succeeded J. L. Manion, whose departure of course we regret, appeared before us. He followed the practice already introduced a year or two ago, that is he tabled additional details on the estimates. In fact, we received six special documents supporting the supplementary estimates document.

I would like to mention, however, that the committee considered 24 dollar items. Of that number, 21 would authorize a transfer of funds from one vote to another; the others are consistent with the habilitating legislation and a finding by the Speaker of the House. They are listed in Schedule 5, which is part of the six schedules appended to the report.

The balance of this report deals with two other problems which the committee examined during its discussion of the budget. Those two issues are additional of course to the numerous ones that were examined by committee members, some of which were given satisfactory answers by witnesses. The others will receive written answers at a later date.

Two items underwent particular scrutiny. Vote No. 5 of the Treasury Board, that is the Government's Contingency Fund. We also scrutinized all aspects of expenditures concerning enquiries, and we made some recommendations.

Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be now adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I give notice that on December 18, 1986, I will call the attention of the Senate to the Seventy-Sixth Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference, which was held in Buenos Aires, Argentina, between October 6 and 11, 1986.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

Motion agreed to.

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA'S INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—RESPONSE OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Honourable senators will recall that the Secretary of State for External Affairs tabled in the other place the response of the government to the report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's International Relations.

Honourable senators may recall that the joint committee, which was co-chaired on behalf of this place by Senator Flynn and Senator Simard, recommended that the government engage the Canadian public on questions of security policy and that whatever mechanism might be set up to achieve co-ordination between the Department of External Affairs and the Department of National Defence on security policy should provide for periodical reports to Parliament. That was the conclusion of the joint committee.

I notice that in the response of the government the point was taken up, and it is suggested by the government that the periodic presentations on these questions shall be made before the appropriate House of Commons committees. The joint committee recommended reports to Parliament, which would include, presumably, committees of the Senate. The government now agrees to report to the appropriate committees of the House of Commons.

I want to know whether this is merely an unfortunate oversight, like many others which appear in the response, or whether it is a deliberate decision on the part of the government to restrict these important presentations on security policy only to the committees of the House of Commons.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the government agreed to set up and took the initiative of setting up the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to report on Canada's international relations. I am quite sure that the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs as to the follow-up to that report intended no slight whatever to the Senate.

Senator MacEachen: Can the Leader of the Government now assure us that the same policy which is to be followed with respect to the appropriate committees of the House of Commons will apply to the committees of the Senate?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, all of the opportunities that are open to committees of the House of Commons are open to the committees of the Senate, including the opportunity to call ministers and officials before the committee to discuss the policies of the government.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, the minister is not really answering the question directly; we all know that there are traditional procedures. But the government has stated in this report that a special effort will be made to brief the appropriate committees of the House of Commons on security policy. The joint committee recommended briefing Parliament, and Parliament includes the Senate. I want the Leader of the Government to tell me whether the approach that was laid down by the minister in his response is applicable to committees of the Senate. That is all: Yes or no?

Senator Murray: As I have said, honourable senators, I am confident that the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not intend to be exclusive in his statement. In this case, I will accept the question and the statements of the Honourable Leader of the Opposition as representations and will make them my own when I discuss the matter with my colleague.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS TO ATLANTIC PROVINCES—
GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. I noticed in an article in today's edition of the Charlottetown Guardian that the Minister of Finance stated on Monday that the six have-not provinces will not receive this year the $175 million that they thought they would get by way of equalization payments. Since the Leader of the Government is also the minister responsible for intergovernmental affairs, I know that he will work very hard with the Minister of Finance to make sure that those Atlantic provinces which are being cut off from every other program will receive that $175 million in equalization payments. The ministers of finance of those provinces have planned on receiving this money. To be told now unilaterally by the Minister of Finance that this will not happen has come as quite a shock to them. The minister from New Brunswick, Mr. Baxter, has said that he is very disappointed.

I would like the assurance of our minister that he will work as hard as he can with the Minister of Finance to try to get that money back for those poorer provinces of this country.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, certain changes of a technical nature were made to the equalization formula, changes which benefit the provinces to which my friend has referred by some $170 million. As I understand the position of the Minister of Finance, that increase in equalization payments will take place not over one year but over two years.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government is quite correct, this money will be received over a two-year period. But to have that money over two years rather than one year, as was planned, is an awful catastrophe to the provincial ministers of finance who are trying to budget. It seems that the federal government has lately been putting a greater and greater burden upon the provinces. I ask the government leader, as the minister responsible, to use his good offices on behalf of the Atlantic provinces. I know that he has a heart. Some of the ministers in his government do not have a heart.

Senator Frith: He has a heavy heart, in fact, these days!

Senator Bonnell: He comes from Atlantic Canada, where he knows the need is great. He knows that the maritime provinces are in dire straits. I am just asking him to put that knowledge of his to work in cabinet, in the Treasury Board and wherever else he can to persuade the Minister of Finance to realize what he is doing to these provinces.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, at a time of considerable financial stringency, I think the provinces are pleased to realize that it was possible to make changes in the equalization formula that would benefit them by $170 million, even if it is to be introduced over two years rather than one year. This program is purely within the federal purview; it is not subject to agreement with the provinces. I think that the provincial governments, even those of the maritimes, will understand that no government in this country, with the possible exception of Newfoundland, is required to spend a greater share of its revenues on servicing its old debts than is the federal government.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have another supplementary question. I thank God for the Constitution, because it means that we are guaranteeing to those provinces equalization. It is now a right under the Constitution and it is a right that these provincial ministers of finance feel they have. I know that the Leader of the Government in the Senate is trying to put forward an answer because he does not want to go against the policy of his own government. I know that he is trying to be as nice as he can, but he is aware of the dire straits of those provinces.

I wonder whether he would talk to his Prime Minister and ask him if he would stop building that prison up in his own riding in Quebec so that he could save that $41 million in extra cost and give it to the three maritime provinces. That $41 million would be of tremendous help to all of the constituencies in the maritimes rather than to just one which happens to be the Prime Minister's constituency. I would ask the government leader to speak to the Prime Minister quietly on the side, before cabinet meets and before the Treasury Board meets. I am sure that with his ability, he could do that for Atlantic Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—IMPEDIMENTS TO AGREEMENT

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, last week an important and powerful group of American senators came to Ottawa, apparently at the invitation of the government, to discuss with officials and others the current fast-track negotiations respecting the Canada-U.S. comprehensive free trade agreement. Senator Bentsen, who is the designated chairman of the U.S. Senate Finance Committee, stated that while in principle he favours a fast-track comprehensive free trade agreement, he felt that as a condition to reaching such an agreement current impediments would include requiring compromise on the Canadian policies respecting protection of our cultural industries, the Auto Pact, our investment policies and our financial institutions.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise us of the major impediments that the Canadian government put on the table that would require compromise by the American Congress in order to achieve such an agreement?

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

THE NORTH—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government regarding government policy on sovereignty in the north, because in the Throne Speech on October 1 the government stated, and I quote, "that the government asserts complete sovereignty over the Canadian Arctic and recognizes that that sovereignty requires a vigorous national presence."

Since then the government has, in fact, been removing some of the Canadian military presence in the north, and we now have a request by the council of the town of Inuvik for protection by the U.S. military forces. A resolution was passed by that council asking the United States for military protection.

The statement by the mayor is, and I quote, "that the Canadian forces has abandoned the north, pulling out its station in Inuvik last summer along with about 700 personnel."

In light of the Throne Speech statement, could the minister inform the Senate as to what the government policy is?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, that question is answered, at least in part, in the course of a delayed answer which will be tabled later by the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Senator Molgat: As a supplementary question on the matter of Arctic sovereignty, I should like to raise the matter of U.S. oil drilling within what is considered by Canada to be its own territorial waters.

Could the minister tell me whether that is also in the delayed response or is that another subject?

Senator Murray: No, it is not in the delayed response, but I do have a report on the matter if the honourable senator will bear with me for a moment.

Senator MacEachen: You are too well briefed!

Senator Frith: You have all those answers and we are not coming through with the questions.

Senator Murray: In response to the question the honourable senator has just asked me, the information that has been given to me is to the effect that public hearings are being held to consider the environmental impact of possible oil and gas activity in the Beaufort Sea.

On December 9, Canada protested because the hearings deal with the most easterly area of the 141st meridian.

We will continue to monitor developments and to present our views forcefully to the U.S. administration.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

NATIVE LAND CLAIMS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, a couple of weeks ago I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate about when the government would be announcing a new native claims policy. At that time his reply to me was, "Soon." I wonder when "soon" will be. Is it today or will his reply still be "soon"?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): It is certainly not today, honourable senators. I can tell my friend that the matter is still under consideration by the government.

Senator Marchand: I would like a little more precision. What stage of consideration is it at? Is it before cabinet? When is it likely an announcement will be made?

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Murray: I am not in a position to say when an announcement might be made. I can tell my friend that the matter is before cabinet and that a decision has not yet been made.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS TO ATLANTIC PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is supplementary to that asked by Senator Bonnell.

What bothers me is that I understood the Leader of the Government in part of his answer to say that the provinces were pleased. I would not want that to remain unchallenged on the record of the Senate.

Speaking for my province, the Minister of Finance and other ministers have expressed great displeasure and disappointment at that decision—which decision was made by the Minister of Finance of Canada alone—to take two years to come up to the $175-million level.

The Minister of Finance from my province and from other provinces had understood—according to the Minister of Finance, quite incorrectly—when they were told earlier in the year that there were going to be major cutbacks in the amount of financing from the federal government towards health and education to the provinces, that that would be at least partially made up by an increase in equalization payments. That was the atmosphere in which they were working in trying to arrive at some budget figures for the next fiscal year.

If I understood the minister correctly, I hope that he will correct his statement that the provinces of Quebec, Manitoba, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island were in any way satisfied. Would the Leader of the Government comment on that.

So far as the pleasure or displeasure of the recipient provinces is concerned, I think it is fair and accurate to say that they are pleased that the collaboration between the federal government and the provinces on these technical points has resulted in a benefit to them of some $170 million, and that they are displeased that the money will be forthcoming over two years rather than one.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, those of us who come from the smaller provinces have had to live with this fait accompli attitude over the years. At times like this we are frustrated. At times like this we wish the Senate were composed of an equal number of senators from each province and where, in at least one part of Parliament, the poor provinces would have the same voice and the same strength as the rich. This lack has caused many of the problems in this country.

The Minister of Finance can make decisions like this and he is protected because he has the support of the wealthiest provinces, and those provinces, naturally, compose the greatest number of members in the House of Commons and in this chamber. The end result is that the people at the extremities of this country suffer and are dissatisfied most of the time. This is not political partisan politics; this is the situation as it actually exists.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, with regard to the Senate, I think it should be pointed out that the provinces which are receiving equalization have a majority in this chamber. If my honourable friend were to do a head count, he would see that Quebec has 24 senators and the Atlantic provinces have 30.

TRANSPORT

CLOSING OF CN SHOPS, MONCTON—PRESENT SITUATION

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I would now like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate another question. Can he advise the people of New Brunswick of the present status of the CN shops at Moncton?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I can tell my honourable friend that the government hopes the parties concerned will continue talking and try to achieve a solution, because if they do not the layoffs will have to continue, and if there is no reindustrialization of the site the plant will close.

● (1510)

Senator Thériault: That is more good news for the people of New Brunswick. I should make the point again that if we had an elected Senate with equal representation from the provinces, we might be in a better position than we are now.

GRAIN

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—FINAL PAYMENTS FOR GRADES 1 AND 2 SPRING WHEAT

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. As he knows, there is in Ottawa today a large delegation from the Western Canadian Wheat Growers Association. That delegation is putting to the government the simple proposition that the farmers who produced grades 1 and 2 spring wheat should be able to receive the final payments that the sale of those grains have earned in the accounts of the Canadian Wheat Board, and that the money should not be confiscated from those producers by way of deducting from those profits the losses which have occurred on lower grade grain. I would ask the Leader of the Government to tell us what is the state of consideration of this simple, fair and just request, and whether he can give us any hope that the government is addressing this question.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I can only tell the honourable senator that the Honourable Charles Mayer, Minister of State for the Wheat Board, and the Honourable John Wise, Minister of Agriculture, are meeting with the delegation to which the honourable senator refers, and any announcement will have to come from those ministers later today or tomorrow.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the Leader of the Government say whether or not the government has agreed that there is justice in the proposition which the delegation has put forward? Is there agreement by the ministers involved that the delegation has a good case and they are taking that good case to the cabinet? Have they gone even that far?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it would be quite premature for me to express a judgment of that kind on that matter.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I do not believe that the answer is satisfactory, and I do not consider that the question is premature. As the Leader of the Government will recall, on November 26 I asked the same question in a more general way, and was told that only Alvin Hamilton and I could incorporate the whole history of grain marketing in putting forth a question. However, it was more or less the same question, and the minister replied as follows:

I will ask the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, the Honourable Charles Mayer, to clarify the points raised by the honourable senator, and I will endeavour to bring in a report within a day or two.

After I pressed him further, he went on to say:

I will see that those representations are brought to the attention of the minister. I am sure that he will address them in the report that he gives me to bring to the Senate.

The commitment was "within a day or two." When are we going to get that report?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the response that I received from my colleagues was that they were meeting with the group to which the honourable senator referred. When they have done that, I will ask them for a further report and I will bring it to the Senate.

Senator Argue: I have full confidence—I say that deliberately and sincerely—that the Leader of the Government wishes to bring us a report. I hope that the report will be forthcoming, and I again plead with him to put forward his own recommendation that in dealing with the three prairie provinces and B.C., where the producers have produced this high quality wheat, that they should be able to be assured that what is estimated to amount to 62 cents per bushel that really belongs to them is, in fact, paid out to them.

TRANSPORT

INCREASE IN CN FREIGHT RATES

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning another delegation which is in Ottawa this week meeting with representatives of all parties and cabinet ministers. It is a delegation from Hinton, Alberta, drawing our attention to the situation in the pulp mill in that area which employs 800 Albertans and which, if modernization goes ahead, may provide another 450 permanent jobs in an area of economic downturn.

The issue is the viability of the mill in view of a 4 per cent increase in CN freight rates over the past year, and a pending additional 4 per cent increase in January. The increase has been before the Canadian Transport Commission for the past eight months and the delegation is anxiously awaiting a decision. Can the Leader of the Government indicate when that decision might be forthcoming from the CTC?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for the Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I understand that a decision will be forthcoming tomorrow.

Senator Olson: A good answer.

Senator Fairbairn: I thank the Leader of the Government.

ILLITERACY

REMEDIAL MEASURES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I am prompted to ask a question completely unrelated to my previous question. I believe that all honourable senators would applaud the Solicitor General's decision to launch a war on illiteracy in Canadian prisons. Apparently he was extremely shocked to find that on average 40 per cent of inmates in Canadian prisons are functionally illiterate. He would be even more shocked if he knew that in specific institutions the rate is much higher than the average. Can the Leader of the Government indicate whether early in the new year the government plans a national war on illiteracy, as recommended by the Senate Youth Committee in its report earlier this year?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, as the honourable senator has pointed out, the illiteracy problem was referred to in the report of the Senate committee, in the recent Forget report and, before that, by the Macdonald Commission. I will have to take as notice the question of whether the government intends to announce any new policies in this regard.

Senator Fairbairn: Can the Leader of the Government indicate whether there are firm plans yet in place for the national forum on education, which was referred to in the Throne Speech; and will the federal government itself take a leading role in hosting and organizing this initiative so that illiteracy and other important subjects may be discussed in a national forum?

Senator Murray: Whether we should host the forum is still an open question. Discussions have been going on during the last little while between the Secretary of State, his provincial counterparts and representatives of post-secondary institutions in the country. I have had some correspondence with my colleague on that matter, and I will be glad to make copies available to Senator Fairbairn.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

THE NORTH—GOVERNMENT PROTEST TO U.S. GOVERNMENT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary to the question I asked previously. The Leader of the Government, in response to my question concerning American drilling in the Canadian section of the Beaufort Sea, indicated that the government had lodged a protest with the United States. Can the Leader of the Government supply us with copies of those documents, the statements made by the Canadian government and the letter, or whatever it is, that the Canadian government sent?

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED TUNNEL OR CAUSEWAY BETWEEN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND MAINLAND—FEASIBILITY STUDY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. In the Charlottetown Guardian of this morning it says that Ottawa is to fund a major feasibility study on the impact of a fixed crossing between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

Can the Leader of the Government tell me whether that statement is true? Has Ottawa made that decision to fund a major feasibility study on the impact of a fixed crossing between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will have to make inquiries.

Senator Bonnell: When making inquiries, could the Leader of the Government find out whom Dalton Camp recommended to do it?

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS TO MANITOBA, QUEBEC AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I have a supplementary to the question I asked earlier. In the Charlottetown Evening Patriot of Monday, December 15, it says, concerning Finance Minister John Baxter of New Brunswick:

"I'm very disappointed," Baxter said in an interview Sunday . . .

However, he went on further and said this, and I quote:

● (1520)

"It defeats the purpose of helping the have-not regions."

—when the Minister of Finance cut this $175 million.

He said Wilson never clearly explained why he changed his mind.

There is a further quote:

"I think he felt partly that some of the provinces weren't on side and he had to take a hard measure."

I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether or not it is a fact that the Minister of Finance cut the equalization payments to Manitoba, Quebec and Prince Edward Island because they did not vote for him, in the same way as the citizenship judge in Ontario told the citizenship candidate that he should vote Conservative. If that is the case, we have really gone down in this country.

Senator Bonnell: Perhaps I could give you the paper—

Senator Murray: I have heard the quotations attributed to Mr. Baxter, the Provincial Treasurer of New Brunswick, but I am sure the honourable senator would not expect me to comment on a press report.

Senator Bonnell: I would expect you to say that you do not believe it is right. Perhaps you believe it, but you do not want to say that.

"ALL WE, LIKE SHEEP, HAVE STRAYED . . ."

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and I will make it short. We know that probably today in the other place the NDP is celebrating the acquisition of a new member from the Conservative Party. However, there is a silver lining in every cloud, certainly for us, because I have been designated to announce officially a similar event here in the Senate. I do so on the basis of a report in the Toronto Star about a Christmas party which featured a video on Eddie Cogan's corporation. That report lists all the dramatis personae and everyone who was there. However, one paragraph says:

There were Tories like Father Sean O'Sullivan, a former MP whose life story was published this fall, and Robert Macauley, Chairman of the Ontario Energy Board; and Liberals like Senator William Kelly.

Welcome, Senator Kelly!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—ROLE OF WOMEN AND HOMOSEXUALS—WHITE PAPER—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarding government policy on defence. Over the past two years, the government has repeatedly promised a white paper on national defence. I think three different ministers have promised it, yet it is still delayed.

Since then, though, there have been a number of statements by the government on various policies. For example, the acquisition of submarines was indicated and a number of other changes. However, very recently there was a policy statement with regard to the employment of women and homosexuals in the armed forces. I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could advise us whether that statement is government policy. Secondly, when can we expect the white paper?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I cannot give a date with regard to the white paper, but so far as the engagement of women and homosexuals in the armed services is concerned, the report in question was the report of a task force of the armed services that was submitted to the Chief of the General Staff. General Manson, in turn, will be submitting his own comments in response to that report to the Minister of National Defence. Therefore, the report of the task force is not government policy.

Government policy was set out some considerable time ago in response to a report from the House of Commons committee entitled: "Equality For All". The position of the government is that we believe that the courts would find that sexual orientation is a prohibited ground of discrimination under the Charter of Rights. In any case, it is our intention to take whatever measures are necessary as a government to ensure that that is the case, so far as the federal jurisdiction extends.

ENERGY

MONITORING OF USE OF FUNDS FOLLOWING TERMINATION OF PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX—GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION IN SYNCRUDE

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask two questions of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I do not expect answers today, but I would like to have them before the Senate adjourns for the holiday season.

My first question is one I have asked the Leader of the Government on a number of occasions, and that is whether or not the government has monitored the use of the funds that were released following the removal of the PGRT in order to make sure that all of that money was used to increase activity and, therefore, employment.

My other question is with respect to the federal government's participation in Syncrude. The Premier of Alberta, I believe, has indicated that he thinks there is a commitment by the federal government to provide a positive response to that request by the end of this year. I realize that there will still be a few more days remaining in this year after we adjourn, but there will not be any further opportunity for us to ask the minister whether or not the federal government intends to give a positive response to this request. Therefore, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could reply to both of those questions before we adjourn on Thursday, because that is probably the last chance we will have to ask questions.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I am delighted to know we will adjourn on Thursday and not on Friday. Having said that, I will do my best in the meantime to bring myself up to date on the two subjects raised by the honourable senator, and I will inform him in the Senate of the results of my research.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers to questions.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—ALBERTA'S WITHHOLDING OF EXPORT LICENCE APPROVAL AND ALLEGED DISTINCTION BETWEEN TYPES OF GAS—ROLE OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 28 last by the Honourable Senator Hays regarding Energy—Natural Gas—Alberta's Withholding of Export Licence Approval and Alleged Distinction between Types of Gas—Role of Federal Government in Negotiations.

(The answer follows:)

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has announced that Canada will move from a Government-administered to a market-oriented pricing system for all natural gas sales beginning November 1, 1986. Effective November 1, all gas prices in international and interprovincial trade are freely negotiated between buyers and sellers, as provided for last fall in the Federal-Provincial Agreement on Natural Gas Markets and Prices. Governments will no longer regulate gas prices.

The Agreement is an excellent example of federal-provincial co-operation both between the Government of Canada and the Western Accord signatories, but also with the consuming provinces who have acted expeditiously to facilitate competitive marketing arrangements.

The Government remains committed to the principle that natural gas export prices should not be less than domestic prices in adjacent export regions. However, a deregulated market does necessitate a new approach to the implementation of this principle. As information on domestic and export costs will now be available only after sales are completed, we will be doing ex poste monitoring of domestic and international price trends. If our monitoring indicates markets are not working as expected and Canadian consumers are being disadvantaged, we will take rapid corrective action.

However, there is no evidence to suggest that domestic prices are higher than export prices. Experience over the past two years has shown that negotiated export prices were consistently higher than regulated domestic prices.

[Senator Olson.]

We are confident that in a functioning market Canadians will not be placed at a price disadvantage.

The Government will also introduce amendments to the National Energy Board Act to remove impediments to direct sales arrangements. In addition, the Government has asked the Board to implement its surplus test for natural gas exports in a manner that reflects the new competitive Canadian market environment. The Government of Canada is not amending or interfering in NEB responsibility to protect reasonably foreseeable domestic requirements. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is not proposing a specific approach to surplus determination. Rather governments left this appropriately to the discretion of the Board. The Minister is only asking the NEB for advice on how surplus procedures might reflect changing market circumstances.

Similarly, the Government of Alberta has asked the Alberta Energy Resources Conservation Board (AERCB) to review provincial surplus tests including, inter alia, the level of protection required by consumers within the province. This is a matter solely within provincial jurisdiction; however, we will be interested in the outcome of this review.

The Agreement did anticipate the reviews of both federal and provincial surplus tests would result in significantly freer access to domestic and export markets.

Market-oriented pricing policy is supported by both the producing and consuming provinces. As noted earlier, governments are no longer setting gas prices because we believe the market is the best determinant. Prices will be market responsive. Natural gas will be attractively priced relative to alternative fuels. These factors, not governments will determine whether prices rise or fall. We are, however, pleased that Canadian gas buyers are taking a long-term view, recognizing that if prices fall too low in the short-term, long-term supply could be jeopardized.

ENTERPRISE CAPE BRETON

POSSIBLE ASSISTANCE TO FINANCIAL ENGINEERING CORPORATION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on October 30 last by the Honourable Senator MacEachen regarding Enterprise Cape Breton—Possible Assistance to Financial Engineering Corporation.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would ask the Deputy Leader of the Government to read the answer.

Senator Doody: The answer is as follows:

Companies who apply for the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit must meet eligibility requirements (outlined in response to Senator Frith's question on November 25, 1986) in order to be issued an offer of assistance. This offer merely confirms that the company is eligible for the program and in no way commits the government to providing the Tax Credit. Once the assets are acquired and in use, the company will then be visited by the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion to ascertain that the company has carried out its project consistent with the Income Tax Act.

According to the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion, none of Mr. White's projects is at present operational and, as such, they have not received the Cape Breton Tax Credit.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

THE NORTH—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 6 last by the Honourable Senator Bonnell regarding Canadian Sovereignty—The North—Government Policy.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, in reply to one of my earlier questions, the Leader of the Government referred me to a delayed answer. Would that be the delayed answer to the question asked by Senator Bonnell? If it is not a lengthy answer, I ask that it be read.

Senator Doody: I will read it for you.

Canada has had a 12-mile territorial sea in the Arctic since 1970. Beyond the 12-mile limit, Canada exercises pollution control out to 100 miles; exclusive sovereign rights over fisheries out to 200 miles; and exclusive sovereign rights for the purpose of explaining and exploiting the natural resources of the continental shelf out to a minimum of 200 miles or to the edge of the continental margin where it extends beyond 200 miles.

On September 10, 1985, Canada established straight baselines around the outer perimeter of the islands of the Arctic archipelago, effective from January 1, 1986. Canada's 12-mile territorial sea and 200-mile fishing zone are measured seaward from these baselines.

Canada maintains a special interest in the Arctic sector beyond its 200-mile zone.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

DRUG PRICING—EFFECT OF PROVISIONS OF BILL C-22

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 25 last by the Honourable Senator Frith regarding Pharmaceutical Industry—Drug Pricing—Effect of Provisions of Bill C-22.

(The answer follows:)

The cost to consumers of newly introduced patented drugs will not be higher than otherwise if Bill C-22 is passed. The Patented Medicine Prices Review Board which will be created by Bill C-22 will be examining the introductory (and continuing) prices of new drugs. Traditionally, drugs have been introduced at almost 80 per cent of the price of drugs in the U.S. We expect the Board to ensure that this will continue.

Where the Board finds that a patented drug has been introduced in Canada at a price that is higher than in other countries, the Board will have the power to require the price of the drug to be set at what it considered a fair level.

In general, the Board is empowered to consider the following factors in relation to the price of a drug: the price of the drug in Canada for the preceding five years; the price of other drugs in the same therapeutic class during the preceding five years; the price of the drug and others in the same therapeutic class in other countries for the preceding five years; and the Consumer Price Index. Where this information is not sufficient for the Board to make a determination, it may also consider the costs of making and marketing the drug where such information is available and whatever other factors are considered relevant given the circumstances.

INDUSTRY

NOVA SCOTIA—POSSIBLE MANUFACTURE AND EXPORT OF ARMAMENTS BY WEST GERMAN COMPANY FROM PROPOSED PLANT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 26 last by the Honourable Senator MacEachen regarding Industry—Nova Scotia—Possible Manufacture and Export of Armaments by West German Company from Proposed Plant.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I would ask the Deputy Leader of the Government to read the answer.

Senator Doody: The government is committed to economic recovery in Cape Breton and has introduced a generous incentive package for investors. To date, we have received nearly 2,600 inquiries concerning a variety of projects.

In the case of Thyssen, the company inquired about government policies and programs which could effect the establishment of an industrial complex in Cape Breton. This information has been provided to the company which has not yet informed us of its plans for locating a plant in Cape Breton. Government officials are following the case closely.

Senator MacEachen: If I may, I have two supplementary questions with respect to the answer. The first one is with respect to negotiations. Are there discussions going on between Thyssen and the Government of Canada, or is it, as the answer seems to imply, merely a request for information? Perhaps even more important is whether the government has taken any decision with respect to providing an export licence to the company which, according to press reports, wishes to sell armaments in the Middle East or to countries against which there have been prohibitions in the past. I wonder whether the government is now saying or will say in this case, "Yes, we would allow Canada to export, for example, tanks to the Middle East."

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I have not been provided with that information, but I shall make every effort to get it for the honourable senator.

COMMUNICATIONS

PROPOSED SALE OF TELEGLOBE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 26 last by the Honourable Senator Austin regarding Communications—Proposed Sale of Teleglobe.

(The answer follows:)

The time frame for this final bidding stage in the privatization of Teleglobe Canada is entirely reasonable. Bidders who expressed interest in the company when the government announced its intention to privatize Teleglobe in August of 1985 are thoroughly familiar with its operations. While the Government has not actively sought new bidders at this stage, any who do come forward must be prepared to submit their proposals within the same time frame as the original bidders. The Government has proceeded very carefully in making decisions on complex and interrelated issues which affect the sale of the company. Now that the policy and regulatory framework has been defined, the bidding process can move forward without delay.

Legislation is currently in preparation, and it is the government's intention to bring it forward at the earliest opportunity.

With respect to the matter of control, the Government is committed to ensuring that effective control does not rest with the telephone companies and it is a condition of sale. The winning bidder(s) will need to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Government that this condition has been fully respected. Subsequently, changes in the control position will be subject to prior approval by the CRTC. It should also be noted that the limit of shareholding by the eligible domestic telephone companies will be reduced from 40 per cent to 33-1/3 per cent after the initial public share offering.

The Government is not limiting to 15 per cent the shareholding which can be placed with employees and the general public. The conditions of sale contemplate that at least 15 per cent of the shares will be owned by employees and the public within three years. The bidding terms specify that the purchaser(s) will be required to put in place an employee share purchase plan encompassing approximately 5 per cent of the company's shares.

[Senator MacEachen.]

The government feels that it is important that Teleglobe's employees and individual Canadian investors should be given the opportunities to participate in the ownership of a privatized Teleglobe. Bidders have been given a set of criteria on this point with the understanding that there is flexibility to improve upon this base case in the preparation of their bids.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF CHURCHILL, MANITOBA—MAINTENANCE OF FACILITIES AND TRANSPORTATION OF GRAIN TO PORT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 26 last by the Honourable Senator Guay regarding Transport—Port of Churchill, Manitoba—Maintenance of Facilities and Transportation of Grain to Port.

(The answer follows:)

During the 1986 Churchill shipping season, the port handled some 600,000 tonnes of grain, making it one of its busiest years to date.

Notwithstanding the logistical difficulties associated with shipping grain through Churchill, Canadian National Railways performed well considering that the Canadian Wheat Board made some sales relatively late in the season. CP Rail co-operated with CN in carrying grain in boxcars from its grain shipping blocks to Churchill. In order to ship 750,000 tonnes of grain through Churchill in a shipping season there must be a sales demand based on the willingness of the Board's customers to use the port.

The Honourable Senator will be aware of the joint federal/provincial announcement made on December 5, 1986 by the Minister of Transport and the Manitoba Minister of Highways and Transportation concerning an $18M joint project to rebuild approximately 950 12-meter boxcars for grain service to the Port of Churchill.

This boxcar rehabilitation program will ensure continued grain flow to the Port of Churchill and will provide sufficient rolling stock to allow 750,000 tonnes of grain to be delivered to the Port in 1987. The project will be completed at CN's Transcona shops during 1987 and will provide an additional 200 person-years of employment in Manitoba.

The Senator will be aware that there is no road at present to Churchill. The gravel road built in recent years by the Province of Manitoba stops at Gillam some 184 miles south of Churchill.

The decision of Canada Ports Corporation not to heat any of its facilities this winter and lay-off a small staff is a responsible corporate commercial decision. The Minister of Transport has been assured that there is no prospect of damage to the port buildings and plant.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SYRIA—JOINT ACTION BY CANADA AND OTHER NATIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 27 last by the Honourable Senator MacEachen regarding Foreign Affairs—Syria—Joint Action by Canada and Other Nations.

(The answer follows:)

Canada's objective continues to be to encourage Syria to modify its behaviour. We are not interested in posturing. The recall of our ambassador for consultation was a strong signal to the Syrians. We were the first to respond to the British request for support.

Apart from the Belgians, who withdrew their ambassador for only a few days in November, Canada was the only country which took this action in the absence of a direct threat to its nationals from Syrian-sponsored terrorism.

We urged the Europeans to take concerted action to demonstrate the unacceptability of the Syrian actions and we encouraged moderate Arab states to counsel Syrian restraint. Canada supported the measures adopted by the European Community on November 10 as well as those subsequently announced by the USA.

Canada's relations with Syria are limited. We have no air relations, no high level visits, no Syrian representatives in Canada and no bilateral development assistance programs.

Forthcoming trials in Italy and Spain will be relevant to decisions about future actions. In addition, if Syria does not modify its behaviour, Canada, along with other members of the international community, will be obliged to consider what further action might be appropriate.

We have not returned our ambassador to Damascus. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has indicated that we will do so at a time still to be determined. This will occur when there is reason to believe that his return can contribute to the common objective of modifying Syrian behaviour.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POLICY—MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a document which has been provided by the Minister of State for Science and Technology. Some time ago, Senator Hicks asked for a policy statement on the subject of the National Research Council Funding, and the minister has forwarded such a statement which is a ten-page document. I ask that it be taken as read at this point and that it be included as a ministerial statement in today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[The text of the statement follows:]

The purpose of this statement is to outline the government's position with respect to the National Research Council. The statement will review the government's policy towards science and technology in general, what this has meant for NRC, and how we see NRC in the future.

POLICY

The government's policy reflects both the government's philosophy with respect to Science and Technology and the situation inherited from the previous administration.

The Speech from the Throne announced the opening of a major effort to carve out a significant place for science and technology in the culture of Canada. In the past, lack of leadership and lack of prestige caused many Canadian students and the brightest of our scientists to turn to careers in other countries rather than to the careers of tomorrow in Canada. Science lacked the visibility and the prominence that would cause educators and the media to give it the attention it merits as a determining factor in our future. One of our principal priorities is to establish a new environment which gives value and appreciation to scientific achievement applied to improving our well-being and to resolving long-standing problems.

In our view, enlisting technology and other policy instruments in the task of generating new exports and maintaining our current market share is the only possible satisfactory solution. We believe that Canada can compete in high technology exports, that we can use technology to improve the competitiveness of our resource industries and that we can make technology form the basis of an aggressive, international service sector. Success in doing so is imperative because without technology-nurtured production we will lose competitively, we will lose jobs and we will face a declining standard of living.

That is the broad picture. Before taking office the government had already outlined the changes it wanted to make. These changes included: increased activity, especially in the private sector; a better mobilization of resources in industry; and government laboratories that were more responsive and relevant to the country's needs. These views had then, and still have, widespread support in the country. They found expression in the report of the "Task force on Federal Policies and Programs for Technology Development" (the Wright Report), and the Report of the Senate Committee on Science and Technology.

ACTIONS

Had we taken office with a clean slate there would have been few problems in mounting these reforms. Instead we inherited crisis. Years of unrealistic spending had led to an intolerable deficit position. Federal science and technology expenditures were an uncoordinated grab bag of programs, many just bricks and mortar, not science, working in isolation and often at cross purposes. This meant that we could not move as freely or as quickly as we wanted to.

In particular, on assuming office we found that the federal government's science and technology effort was in poor shape. There was no consistent national science and technology policy or priorities. As a result, the efforts of federal agencies, provincial organizations, universities and industry were uncoordinated and, at times, ineffective. Funding for the granting councils was not secure, and vast sums were being spent on additional bricks and mortar for various federal facilities. Finally, the Scientific Research Tax Credit was losing significant tax revenue with little result.

Since taking office the government has worked on four different fronts. First, we halted the SRTC and replaced them with a refundable tax credit designed to help all Canadian companies, especially small start-up firms. Second, we have given the granting councils a guaranteed funding base for the next five years, plus an incentive to work with universities and the private sector in increasing industry/university contracts. From this measure alone, the university research community could receive over $1 billion in additional funds over the next five years. Third, we have developed a national consensus on science and technology that fully involves all players. The product of this consensus building will be announced in the near future and will involve concrete action by all parties. Fourth, we have begun to rationalize the government's laboratory system, including NRC, to focus federal efforts on support to industry, to accelerate technology transfer and diffusion, and to improve service to the public.

All these measures have been put in place within the constraints imposed by the deficit position.

NRC

NRC, like every government agency, has therefore been faced with a requirement to change. There have been reductions, there have been reallocations and there have been new funds. NRC has neither been the most affected agency of government, nor the least affected. Its President, Dr. Kerwin, has estimated that something between five and ten per cent of its programs have been affected. He believes NRC remains a strong and viable research agency. So does the government.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate (Senator Murray) has pointed out that the government has already provided a great deal of information in the House of Commons, before the Standing Committee on Research, Science and Technology, and in statements, press releases and interviews. A great many questions have been raised and answered and I can provide briefings on any particular issue. Now however, I will simply reiterate the major points.

The extent of the cuts is not as great as has been made out. NRC's budget peaked in 1984-85 at $480 million in actual expenditure. Next year we expect total expenditures to amount to $431 million—a drop of between nine and ten per cent. The budget in 1984-85 contained $46 million for buildings. This year the budget has only $7 million for buildings and next year will be similar. This means that research, contributions and equipment expenditures have scarcely fallen at all.

The impact on people is not as severe as has been made out. At its peak, NRC consumed 3,591 person years in 1984-85 as compared with an estimated 3,400 in 1986-87 and 3,447 forecast for next year. These reductions and other reallocations have had personnel and career consequences, but very few lay-offs. NRC is reassigning people to expanding areas like space and biotechnology, transferring some facilities and research teams to industry and universities, providing an early retirement program and offering career counselling and job search assistance. Altogether these actions will ensure that valuable research and technical people remain effectively employed, even if they are not employed at the NRC.

The impact on NRC's programs is not as severe as many have implied. The reductions were selected by NRC after long and detailed study. Programs with a high service-to-industry content were favoured and the Industrial Research and Assistance Program (IRAP) contributions were not reduced. Dr. Kerwin has steadfastly defended these decisions and maintained that their impact on NRC's effectiveness is not great.

The individual reductions give rise to many separate issues and judgement calls. In my opinion much of this commentary has been misinformed and has focused on the reduction in isolation, not acknowledging NRC's need to maintain a coherent program of continuing activities. The photogrammetric unit is a case in point. This unit has done first class and useful research. If not, it would have been discontinued earlier. Photogrammetry, I am told, is now a mature science somewhat removed from the current focus of the rest of NRC's Physics Division. The nation can count on research from a variety of industry and university sources. NRC and the government cannot do everything. In cases like this they have to step aside and leave the research to others.

Nevertheless, in response to widespread concern, I have appointed a three-person Task Group to undertake consultations on behalf of the Government with the President and members of the National Research Council. This Group will examine the soundness of the individual choices made by NRC and confirm that neither health and public safety of Canadians nor priorities of the NRC are being jeopardized. A copy of the press release announcing this Task Group is attached.

That is where we are now. In the future the Government will continue to support Canadian science and technology. This means that NRC will continue to play a significant and important role. We have recently approved additional funds for Space and Biotechnology at NRC and similar increases in other new and growing areas may be expected.

APPROPRIATION ACT NO. 3, 1986-87

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved second reading of Bill C-29, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1987.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before us today, Appropriation Act No. 3 for 1986-87, provides for the release of the whole of Supplementary Estimates (A) for the 1986 year, amounting to some $339 million. The total spending authority requested by this bill is just over $507 million, the difference representing statutory items, including a reduction of $263 million in nonbudgetary payments to the Export Development Corporation. The majority of the requested authority, some $185 million, relates to increased expenditures under the Indian and Inuit Affairs Program, some $109 million, and the Agriculture Agrifoods Program, some $76 million. The balance is distributed throughout a number of government programs. These estimates were tabled in the Senate on November 25, 1986, and immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. These estimates were discussed by the National Finance Committee with Treasury Board officials on November 26, 1986, and the committee presented its report today.

Honourable senators, I have no hesitation in giving the usual assurance that this bill is in the standard form. Nothing out of the ordinary has been added or changed in the form of the bill. Senator Leblanc earlier today presented a very comprehensive report from the National Finance Committee. I commend these supplementary estimates to the Senate for second reading.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, although there is no doubt that the Senate has the constitutional power to deny supply to government, it is hard to imagine any situation in which it would do so. Even in Australia where the Senate has both the constitutional power and, I suppose, the political power to do so, it is seldom done. The last time they took such action it created quite a crisis. We, of course, always grant the government supply. However, certain comments and criticisms, always constructive of course, are in order.

Since our committee has done a very good job, as usual, in studying the estimates and, therefore, in effect, giving us all the material we need to pass this appropriation bill, I suggest that before we do so senators might want to peruse the report presented earlier today to determine whether there are particular items of interest to them about which they might want to ask Senator Doody to give an explanation or to obtain an answer. We could then deal with the bill tomorrow.

I have one question about which Senator Doody might want to obtain an answer for me. It is with regard to page 2 of the report. I have some other comments, but this is a matter about which Senator Doody might be able to do something in the meantime in order to be able to deal with it when he closes second reading debate in the manner provided for in our rules. The second paragraph on page 2 of the report reads:

The remainder of this report focuses on two specific issues which the Committee addressed in its deliberations on these Estimates.

I recommend to honourable senators those two specific issues, which are found in the report and which will be found in tomorrow's Debates of the Senate in the remarks made by Senator Leblanc. The paragraph goes on:

These two issues are in addition to the many questions pursued by members of the Committee, some of which were answered by the witnesses to the satisfaction of the Committee while others will be responded to in writing at a later date.

I am prepared to accept that the committee is satisfied with the answers given to the questions it raised during the hearings, but I would like to know what those questions are that are to be responded to at a later date and whether or not we will have the responses before we vote supply.

With those remarks, I move the adjournment of the debate until tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

RAILWAY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Finlay MacDonald moved second reading of Bill C-4, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: Honourable colleagues, I introduce for your consideration Bill C-4, which is a bill to amend the Railway Act and which, in its simplest terms, permits the government to recover the costs of regulating the telecommunications industry. The bill follows from the November '84 economic statement and, more recently, from the May 1985 budget. Some of you may recognize it as Bill C-125, which was introduced in the other place on June 26, which, as you will remember, was the day before the House recessed for the summer. It is interesting to note that this is the first bill from the Department of Communications to pass through the House of Commons in ten years.

It was in the May 1985 budget that the Minister of Finance announced that the government would begin to recover the costs of regulating the telecommunications industry in the fiscal year 1986-87, as part of its effort to reduce the federal deficit. Bill C-4 gives effect to this measure and will permit the recovery of costs incurred by the CRTC in regulating the telecommunications carriers under federal jurisdiction.

It might be helpful, possibly a little briefer and more interesting, if I were to pose some obvious questions and then attempt the answers. The obvious first question is: Who will be affected by this legislation? Answer: There are six telecommunications carriers regulated by the CRTC pursuant to the Railway Act. These companies are: Bell Canada, the British Columbia Telephone Company, CNCP Telecommunications, Telesat Canada, Northwest Tel and Terra Nova Tel. Provincially regulated carriers are not affected by this legislation.

• (1540)

Question: How much does the government expect to recover from these six telecommunications carriers? Answer: The legislation will permit the government to recover approximately $6 million in revenue annually, beginning in 1986-87.

Question: Well, this sounds as though Bill C-4 includes a retroactivity clause—a very good question. Does it? Answer: Yes, although retroactivity would be a legitimate criticism in certain instances, it does not appear to be justified in this particular case. The affected carriers have been aware of this cost recovery measure since its announcement as a budget matter in November 1985. They were further informed of the $6 million cost recovery target when Bill C-125 was introduced in June of 1986. Therefore, the view of the government is that sufficient information was available to the carriers for planning and budgetary purposes.

Question: How will $6 million in fees be allocated to these carriers? Answer: A method of allocating these costs will be determined by the CRTC, which will take into consideration various factors such as the volume of business and the volume of regulatory activity associated with each carrier.

Question: What financial impact will the collection of these cost recovery fees have on the industry? Answer: The collection of cost recovery fees will not have a significant financial impact on the industry. The $6 million to be recovered in 1986-87 represents less than 0.1 per cent of the annual operating revenues of the six carriers affected.

Question: Well, will these fees be paid by the companies or by their subscribers? Answer: We expect that the CRTC will treat the fees as a legitimate business expense and will therefore allow it to be included in the revenue requirement. Subscribers will ultimately provide the revenue to pay these fees. This is appropriate since it is the subscribers who benefit from the protection afforded by the regulation.

Question: How does this cost recovery measure compare with those found in other jurisdictions? Answer: The principle of cost recovery has been applied in several provinces, including Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, and, of course, a number of American states.

Question: Why are cost recovery measures being introduced for an organization like the CRTC, which is already generating more revenues from licensing fees than it incurs in expenses? Apparently it costs the CRTC approximately $25 million to operate, while it receives $33 million or $35 million from the broadcasting industry and will net another $6 million upon the passage of this bill from the telecommunications industry. Answer: The purpose of the cost recovery measures for telecommunications is to distribute costs more equitably between the telecommunications and the broadcasting industries. While it may be that the broadcasting revenue more than adequately covers the cost of regulating the broadcasting industry, this should not mean that the telecommunications industry should not shoulder its share of cost recovery. One must assume, therefore, that the extra amount would go back into the general revenue.

Question: What controls will be exerted upon the CRTC so as to ensure that the fee structure is fair and reasonable? Answer: The fees established by the CRTC will be monitored to be sure that they are consistent with the government's intention to keep regulatory expenses to a minimum and for the purpose specified. Therefore, Treasury Board will approve or disapprove the fees imposed by the CRTC.

Question: Why is this done by means of an amendment to the Railway Act? Answer: Because it is the act which outlines the CRTC's regulatory powers in the field of telecommunications. It will now grant to the commission the required authority to assess carrier fees, an authority similar to that which it already possesses under the Broadcasting Act in relation to licence fees for broadcasters and cable operators.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I think that Bill C-4 will allow the government to continue its efforts to reduce the costs of governing to the Canadian taxpayer. At the same time, we believe that the measure is fair, reasonable and consistent with regulatory practices elsewhere, and that it contains adequate protection for the commercial interest of the carriers' industry.

Earlier this afternoon, honourable senators, the distinguished chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications reported that that committee had studied the subject matter of this bill and recommended that it now be favourably considered by the Senate.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, if I may, I would like to put my understanding of Bill C-4 on the record of this house. This bill has a single purpose which is to increase taxes and increase revenue. As a matter of fact, this morning in committee those of us who were present asked some questions. As far as I am concerned, we were not given very clear answers.

Honourable senators, it seems to me that the purpose of this legislation, as is stated in the bill, is to provide revenues for the CRTC to carry on its work. As the Honourable Senator MacDonald has just pointed out and as I pointed out this morning in committee, the CRTC now recovers more revenue from licensing fees than it disburses in expenses. The CRTC in its operation now recovers approximately $33 million and the expenditures for its operation amount to approximately $26 million.

This bill, honourable senators, will provide, at the discretion of the Treasury Board—and we do not see the regulations; it could even be more if Treasury Board so decides—the opportunity for the CRTC to collect a further $6 million. I am not a lawyer, but it seems to me that if I were the head of a major corporation which had to disburse additional funds under this legislation, I would probably contest that in the courts. The purpose of this bill, as is stated within it, is to recover costs. Well, the costs have already been recovered. To me, the purpose of this bill is very simple—it is a measure by which the government can increase its revenue by at least $6 million, and that revenue will go into the general revenue of Canada. If there were anything in the bill that indicated that the additional revenues to be collected by the CRTC were to go into a special fund which that commission could use to help broadcasting through new programming, assistance to art or culture, or anything in that vein, it would be simple to support it. However, I feel that it is more or less a tax measure.

My understanding of this place is that we should not defeat a tax measure, but I simply wanted to put on the record my understanding of this legislation, pure and simple, which is to increase taxation.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I should just like to add some short comments regarding Bill C-4, which, according to my recollection, has been before our committee twice. As my colleagues Senator Thériault and Senator MacDonald have said, this bill constitutes a method by which to increase revenues. This could be called a form of taxation or a form of cost recovery, but whatever it is, the government is going to be $6 million better off when this bill is passed than it would have been if the bill were not passed. The moneys are to be paid by the six carriers, most of whom are the national telephone companies, plus CNCP Telecommunications.

● (1550)

I should like to point out that two bills were before our committee. The other bill, Bill C-3, is quite similar to this one in that it is a cost-recovery bill. However, I would like to make it clear that it is a cost-recovery bill which is quite a bit more controversial. The Minister of Transport for New Brunswick, who appeared before our committee, was very much opposed to the bill as are, apparently, most of the provincial governments.

I say this somewhat in advance for the wisdom of the government house leader, because there seems to be some confusion as to when Bill C-3 may be presented here.

Both bills are similar because they are both referred to by the Department of Communications as cost-recovery bills. Bill C-4, to which I have no objection, essentially refers to collections from the six telecommunications telephone carriers in Canada; and Bill C-3, which will, presumably, be presented here soon, is a much more complicated and controversial bill because it refers to cost recovery from a large number of provincial agencies, health services, the police, in the case of Toronto where I am from, the TTC, and a whole number of other agencies and organizations. I will have more to say when that bill is presented.

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators, how can Senator MacDonald possibly say that it is a cost-recovery item when he has just said that it is not a cost-recovery item, that the additional revenue will be turned back into the general revenue of the government? It certainly is not a cost-recovery item; it is an additional tax.

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator MacDonald speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator MacDonald: —if it appears the revenues are regarded as public moneys and, as the chairman says, will go back into the Consolidated Revenue Fund under whatever section of the Financial Administration Act that is done, then I would have difficulty arguing that this is not a tax.

It is presented as a means of reducing the deficit, even though it is clearly indicated that the present revenues provided by broadcasters are more than sufficient to cover the costs of operating the CRTC; but the government has decided that the telecommunications carriers have been given a free ride and that they now are going to be assessed that amount of money and no more in the formula which I have set out. I would be hesitant to engage the honourable senator in any kind of protracted debate arguing that this is not a tax.

Senator Frith: Even an unprotracted one.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator MacDonald, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-20, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I doubt very much if honourable senators will consider it a pleasure to adopt my motion.

It is my distasteful duty to introduce Bill C-20, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act. This is a bill which the House of Commons passed on December 12 with all-party agreement.

The bill has three purposes. One is to implement the $1,000 cut in senators' and MPs' salaries announced by the Minister of Finance in the budget of February 26, 1986. It permits the $1,000 deduction to be made in instalments from now until March 31, 1987.

The second purpose of the bill is to make a technical amendment to the salary adjustment formula to permit an indexed increase of senators' and MPs' salaries to take place in 1987.

The third purpose is an amendment which replaces references to Statistics Canada's Industrial Composite, a measure of average weekly wages, which has not been published since June 1986, with its successor, the Industrial Aggregate.

Honourable senators, the indexed increase in senators' and MPs' salaries for 1987 is estimated at 2.5 per cent. Under the Salary Adjustment Formula and the Senate and House of Commons Act, the amount of indexation is calculated by taking the lesser of the percentage increase in the Consumer Price Index for 1986, which is estimated at 4.1 per cent, from the Industrial Aggregate for 1986, which is estimated at 3.5 per cent, and then subtracting 1 per cent. Since the percentage increase in the Industrial Aggregate is the lesser of the two in 1986, the indexed adjustment for 1987 is 3.5 per cent less 1 per cent which is an increase of 2.5 per cent.

Honourable senators, Bill C-20 implements the budget initiative announced by the Minister of Finance on February 26.

Our contribution amounts to $102,000 and that of those in the other place amounts to $282,000 for a total reduction of approximately $400,000. Various other cuts have been accepted by the Prime Minister and members of the cabinet which total approximately another $400,000.

The bill corrects the technical problem which I just explained by replacing references to a statistical measure of average weekly salaries of the Industrial Composite which has not been published by Statistics Canada for some time.

Honourable senators, that is the sum and substance of Bill C-20.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I hope that when the motions for second and third reading of this bill are put to us, His Honour the Speaker will find a way to phrase the question in a way other than, "Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?" He will have time to consider the rewording for this one particular occasion.

Honourable senators, except for the change that is necessary to make the system compatible with the new system to be adopted by Statistics Canada, I think this is a rather silly bill. There is no way that any of us can vote against it without appearing to be mean spirited and excessively protective of our own interests.

I believe that MPs and senators currently receive a reasonable payment for their services and that, on an individual basis, $1,000 is not a major cut.

However, two other factors should be considered. One of them is that this does, at least temporarily, politicize something that all parties in the House and, I believe, in the Senate, previously agreed should not be politicized, and that is the matter of payment for services to members of the House of Commons and senators. An attempt was made to try to make the matter automatic and subject to review on a basis other than by spot legislation.

The other aspect is that although, as I said, the loss is not major on an individual basis, the savings also amount to very little. There will be a savings of approximately $282,000 from the reduction of $1,000 in MPs' salaries and $104,000 from the $1,000 cut in senators' salaries for a total of $386,000.

Honourable senators, just to make you all feel better, it may very well be that this saving is going to a good cause, because $382,000 is just about the amount the government has set aside for Mr. Sinclair Stevens to defray his legal costs. I know we all realize that lawyers have to support families. Therefore, speaking on behalf of the Toronto legal community, if I can do so, I can say that perhaps this is going to a good cause.

Honourable senators, if that does not satisfy any of you, I would point out that it would also pay about half of the bill for the Prime Minister's trip to the Far East last spring. That may be more acceptable to some of you as another worthy cause for this cut.

On division, under protest, not at all smiling and with no pleasure at all, we will probably support this bill.

Honourable senators, just before we close the debate, I had intended to ask Senator Doody if in closing the debate on second reading he would explain to us exactly how this $1,000 is to be recovered from the payments for the 1986-87 fiscal year.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Doody speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Doody: —I thank Senator Frith for being a most understanding gentleman. The salary cut will be administered to us over a three-month period from now until the end of March. It was the intention of the authorities to make the deduction in one fell swoop, but someone felt it was too close to the Christmas season to inflict that wound on us at this particular time. Christian charity prevailed and it is being done in three stages.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to raise one point which may have been covered by the address which the deputy leader made and which, unfortunately, I missed.

With respect to the annual increment which is made—I take it for granted that that system is still in effect—when the increment is made for members of Parliament and senators for 1987, will it be based on the reduced amount for 1986 or on the unreduced amount?

• (1600)

Senator Doody: I am told that it will be reduced by the unreduced amount. The projected increase in senators' and MPs' indemnities and allowances will be a 2.5 per cent increase, which I explained in some detail in the course of my remarks. The projected increase will be $1,600 for senators and $1,900 for MPs. The $1,000 deduction will leave us with a $600 increase. The indexing system will remain as it was. In this particular year it will work out to about 2.5 per cent, which is the lesser of the percentage increase in the consumer price index for 1986, which is 4.1 per cent, or the industrial aggregate for 1986, which is 3.5 per cent. Since the percentage increase in the industrial aggregate is the lesser of the two in 1986, the indexed adjustment for 1987 is 3.5 per cent, the lesser of the two, less 1 per cent for an increase of 2.5 per cent. So, the formula remains the same, and will continue next year with the same formula.

Senator MacEachen: Perhaps I have not followed the Deputy Leader of the Government as closely as I should. Is it correct to say that the implementation of the annual increment will be based upon the 1986 salary unredacted?

Senator Doody: That is what I have been told, honourable senators; yes. Honourable senators will have to forgive my hesitancy. It is a very painful subject.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

COASTAL FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall moved the second reading of Bill C-26, to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am charged with moving second reading of Bill C-26, which contains some very important amendments to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act.

As honourable senators are aware, ten years ago, on January 1, 1977, Canada's 200-mile exclusive fishing zone was established. Canada's first job, after being given the mandate to control the resources within 200 miles of its shores, was to rebuild the decimated stocks and to work toward achieving that delicate balance between allowing fishermen to earn a decent income and permitting the resource base to grow. A large part of this effort involved protecting the resources off the Atlantic coast from foreign fleets whose operators largely ignored even the most minimal conservation principles.

Honourable senators from the east coast will recall the many occasions when Soviet and other long liners and draggers came within not only the 200-mile limit but within the 12-mile limit and the three-mile limit off the coast of Newfoundland.

Over the years, Canada has managed to accomplish some progress in setting up a management regime that permitted stocks to expand while also allowing harvesting capacity to increase.

In 1985 Canadian fishermen landed over $900 million worth of fish which was processed into over $2 billion worth of products. The industry employs over 80,000 full-time and part-time fishermen and about 24,000 plant workers.

In Atlantic Canada more than one quarter of the population live in some 1,300 fishing communities, over half of which depend mainly on fishing. In British Columbia, outside the industrial triangle of Vancouver, Victoria and Nanaimo, the commercial fishery is the basis for much of the economic activity in 94 small fishing communities, many of which are single-sector communities.

Honourable senators, I should mention that the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries recently returned from a 12-day tour of the British Columbia coast and learned deeply and intensively the dedication of fishermen on that coast and the impact that the fishing industry has on many communities and their inhabitants.

However, there are limits to growth, and because of that Canada must strive to maintain what it has gained and what it is attempting to regain. It must ensure that these elements are not jeopardized by negative forces.

On June 13 of this year the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced a series of measures to improve surveillance and enforcement within Canada's 200-mile zone on the east coast. Those measures were necessary because of the rise in illegal fishing by foreign vessels in Canadian waters and overfishing just beyond our waters, both of which were putting serious strain on our surveillance forces.

It should be noted from the outset that most foreign vessels fishing in our zone are licensed and abide by the rules attached to those licences. Others, however, fish in our waters with no right to do so, or, if they are licensed, take more fish than they have been allocated.

In the Gulf of Maine in just one year—from 1984 to 1985—the number of unauthorized foreign vessels detected in the Canadian fishing zone doubled. On the Grand Banks in the same year the increase was 1200 per cent. In the past 12 months we have detected 100 intruders in our waters, 30 of whom were arrested and prosecuted.

The number of vessels fishing just beyond the 200-mile zone has also increased. Because the fish stocks in those areas straddle the 200-mile boundary, any overfishing beyond the zone is bound to have an adverse effect on the amount of fish available to our own legitimate fishermen. Also on the increase are vessels that hover around the boundary and make quick hit-and-run incursions into Canadian waters.

There are three reasons for the increase in the trespassing and poaching in the Canadian zone. The first, of course, is the greater demand and higher prices paid for fish in the markets of the world. The second is the serious over-capacity and overfishing that some foreign nations have allowed in their own fisheries. The third is our own success in conservation, which has made Canadian fish stocks inside the zone a reliable resource and which has enriched the areas just outside our waters—a situation that has been achieved through the efforts of our scientists and fisheries managers, and the self-discipline of our own fishermen.

So our 200-mile zone has become very attractive to foreign vessel operators who are more willing than ever to risk fishing in Canadian waters.

Last November at a meeting of provincial ministers in Halifax, the problem of fishing violations was given high priority on the agenda. It was agreed that Canada would take vigorous measures to deal with the problem.

Since that conference, federal and provincial fisheries ministers have met several times and have reached a consensus on a blueprint strategy for the management of Canada's fisheries, a key element of which is increased enforcement and tougher penalties under the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act.

The blueprint was presented at the First Ministers' Conference held recently in Vancouver and was fully endorsed by the premiers. Industry representatives have also given it wide support.

So the policy changes which are before honourable senators today have received the support of provincial fisheries ministers, provincial premiers and the private sector.

Last June the honourable Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced improvements in three areas of surveillance and enforcement. They involve the need to detect violators more efficiently, to arrest them with greater sureness and despatch, and to penalize them more severely. All of those measures are designed to deal with violators more firmly and to deter them from repeating their actions in future.

The detection measures include an expanded observer program, improved aerial surveillance, and new electronic tracking devices.

In terms of arrest and enforcement, offshore patrol vessels are being armed to protect Fisheries and Oceans personnel and to respond to resistance.

The amendments to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act deal with the third area of the program—that is, increasing the penalties or fines on indictment and on summary conviction. This set of measures will ensure that convicted violators think twice before stealing again from Canada.

Illegal fishing by a foreign vessel can be very profitable. The information is that the benefit can exceed $60,000 per day. Repeated illegal fishing over a period of several days can lead to profits well in excess of the maximum fines now provided for, ranging from $5,000 to $100,000. That is why these amendments are being introduced, namely, to ensure that this incentive is removed by making the potential fines more painful.

While the Fisheries Act is the primary act governing the fishing activities of Canadian vessels, it is the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act which establishes the legal parameters within which foreign fishing vessels may enter Canadian waters to engage in fishing.

Among other things, it makes it an offence for an operator of a domestic or foreign vessel to fail to stop when so directed by a government vessel or to refuse to answer questions on oath. It is also an offence to obstruct a fisheries protection officer.

The act prohibits Canadian vessels from bringing into Canadian waters fish received from a foreign vessel outside Canadian waters. It also makes it an offence to violate any of the regulations made under the act.

The regulations deal with licence requirements and conditions of licences. They also deal with reporting requirements such as catch and effort data, and entry to and exit from Canadian waters.

As honourable senators will note, the amendments to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act provide for substantially increased fines—and that is the crux of the bill. The maximum fine for fishing by a foreign vessel without a licence in Canadian waters is being increased to $150,000 from $25,000 on summary conviction, and to $750,000 from $100,000 on indictment. Fines for other foreign and domestic fishing violations are being raised to a maximum of $500,000 from $25,000.

These measures are being taken in conjunction with other steps to reduce overfishing beyond Canada's 200-mile fishing zone, and Canada and other NAFO countries work together to manage the fish stocks which straddle the 200-mile limit. While Canada will continue to seek conservation cooperation through NAFO, other more substantive measures are also being pursued.

Until recently, foreign nations have been allocated surplus and non-surplus fish based on two conditions: One was cooperation in conserving the resource. The second was improved access to markets. However, this second linkage has not proved effective. Gains in exports have come, generally, through market conditions and the competitive ability of the Canadian industry. Therefore, a new approach has been stipulated under the foreign allocations policy. It states that except for obligations under existing treaties and except in the case of East Bloc countries where market forces do not operate in the normal fashion, no new non-surplus allocations will be granted to foreign fleets.

As for fish that are surplus to the needs of the Canadian industry, there is an obligation under international law to make this surplus available to other nations. In the case of free-market countries, these allocations are being linked to one condition only: Good conservation behaviour within the 200-mile zone and in the NAFO management area outside the zone.

The Canadian fishing industry has learned that only through the diligent pursuit of conservation measures will Canada be able to sustain a sound resource base upon which to build a stable economic and social future. Creating a healthy fishery is difficult. Our fishermen know that, and our fishermen deserve the type of protection laid out in these amendments when people from other nations do not follow their lead in conserving the resource.

The measures outlined today are intended to protect the significant gains that have been made and to strengthen the foundation upon which the fishery stands. The amendments to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act are an integral and essential element to achieve success.

Honourable senators, I might mention that the committee pre-studied this bill last week. I recommend the bill to you for your consideration.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Stewart, did you want to say something?

Hon. John B. Stewart: Perhaps, honourable senators, before the debate is adjourned, I can put a problem to the senator who is the sponsor of the bill so that he may be prepared to deal with it, and this might later expedite matters. Honourable senators, as Senator Marshall has said, the bill deals with coastal fisheries protection. I refer to a specific instance that has been covered in the media recently which has agitated a fair number of in-shore fishermen in eastern Canada.

As honourable senators may know, the tuna fishery on the east coast of Canada is basically an in-shore fishery as far as Canadians are concerned. It is conducted from small boats and there are severe limitations on the type of gear and equipment that can be used. This particular year, 1986, was a disaster for most of those fishermen. They invest their time, hoping to catch at least one fish, and this year most of them caught precisely none.

The newspapers have been full of a story that a Japanese company, using quite different kinds of gear, has been permitted by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to fish within Canadian waters and take tuna. This concession is in return for payments to be made to a Canadian company in Nova Scotia based in St. Margaret's Bay. I am sure that honourable senators will readily realize that this is precisely the kind of media coverage which is liable to inflame the deeply-disappointed in-shore fishermen.

I think it would be very helpful to the east coast fishery if the facts concerning this transaction could be put on the record in relation to this bill, which appears to be a relevant piece of legislation. I do not ask that Senator Marshall do that now, but at some other stage in the proceedings perhaps that could be done.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Orville H. Phillips moved the second reading of Bill C-31, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-31 is to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act. The program is no stranger to this chamber. On numerous occasions we have amended the act under some of the conditions, due to the fact that it contains a sunset clause.

The Farm Improvement Loans Program allows farmers to obtain short-term credit for improvements such as the purchase of equipment or the construction of buildings. Lending institutions include the chartered banks, credit unions and the Alberta Treasury Branch. When a loan is granted, it is registered with the Farm Improvement Loans administration, and in cases where a farmer is unable to repay, the lending institution applies to the administration board and receives compensation for its losses.

The program was widely used initially, and then during the 1970s the number of loans began to decline. Although the number of loans declined, I note that the total amount of money covered under the program has remained fairly constant. As the interest rates rose, the banks began to develop their own programs which were not covered by the provision of the act requiring prime plus 1 per cent. Indeed, a number of provinces began their own programs. Quebec has had a very successful program whereby they lend at prime plus 1.5 per cent.

The farm organizations generally support the program. The executive of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has been a strong supporter and has requested a review of the program. Presently the department has such a review under way and is now receiving the views of various farm organizations as well as individual farmers, and will require some additional months to complete the review before recommending new legislation. This amendment extends the program until June 30, 1987. At that time, the government will be introducing a new act, possibly containing amendments as a result of the study.

I urge that the Senate continue the pattern it followed in the past of granting the extension as requested.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, over the years the Farm Improvement Loans Act has been of very great value to farmers in this country, going back to just after the last war. The foundation of that act is, I think, sensible and important. It provides a guarantee to lending institutions that provide loans to farmers under this act. I believe the rate is prime plus 1 per cent and, over many years, it has meant that banks have made available to farmers credit at relatively reasonable interest rates, and they have been prepared to do it because of the government guarantee.

The losses experienced under this act have been very small. In my opinion, this act is basically a good act.

• (1620)

The principle of this act should be followed: namely, that the responsibility of the government of Canada should be to provide a framework of legislation and policy that will make available to agricultural producers credit at reasonable rates of interest. In the past when banks have gone beyond this act, they have sometimes charged very high interest rates. I shall have some further remarks to make on this subject, and so I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Argue, debate adjourned.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson moved the second reading of Bill C-32, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

She said: Honourable senators, Bill C-32 has some similarities to the bill Senator Argue just spoke to. I am pleased to present this legislation to extend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act without amendment for six months. The present act expires on December 31, 1986. So there is a certain amount of urgency in passing this legislation as quickly as possible.

The bill is designed to facilitate credit to fishermen who need the money to finance a number of fishery improvement projects, such as the purchase or construction of a fishing vessel or equipment or major repairs to equipment or to fishing vessels. The legislation authorizes the federal government to guarantee lenders against losses incurred on loans made in accordance with its provisions. It specifies that the maximum amount a fisherman may have outstanding under the act at one time may not exceed $150,000. The maximum repayment period is 15 years. The rate of interest on loans under the act is set at 1 per cent over the prime lending rate of chartered banks. Of course it is allowed to flow with the prime rate for the duration of the loan.

The legislation also lays down the total principal amount of guaranteed loans that may be made by all lending institutions during the lending period. Loans granted under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act must be secured in the form of a chattel or marine mortgage on the item purchased or constructed. The lender is given a written promise by the borrower to repay the loan. Other terms and conditions are worked out between the applicant and the lender. The six-month extension period is being requested by the minister and the other place to ensure that the fishermen continue to have legislation providing them with credit service while the government considers alternatives for streamlining such credit services to the private sector. As some of us know, this matter has been talked about, and it is currently being studied by the department. Given the act's expiry date of December 31, I urge honourable senators to give speedy passage to this bill.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Leblanc, debate adjourned.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

SEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of the Bill C-23, intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and a related Act", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, 27th November, 1986, examined the subject-matter of the said Bill and now reports as follows:

On 26th February, 1986, the Honourable Michael Wilson, Minister of Finance, delivered a budget in the House of Commons.

In accordance with the Order of Reference, your Committee has considered the subject-matter of Bill C-23 which received first reading in the House of Commons on 7th November, 1986. In connection with such consideration, the Committee has retained as its counsel, Mr. Thomas S. Gillespie, of Ogilvy, Renault, Montreal. On 3rd December, 1986, the Committee heard from Mr. R.A. Short, General Director, Tax Policy and Legislation Branch, Department of Finance; Mr. Jim Wilson, General Director, Tax Counsel Division, Department of Finance; and Mr. Claude McDonald, Director General, Current Amendments Division, Department of National Revenue. On 4th December, 1986, the Committee heard from representatives of the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association and from the Life Underwriters Association of Canada. The Committee also received a written submission from the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada, which was discussed between the Committee's counsel and representatives of the Department of Finance.

The more important features of Bill C-23 include amendments to the Income Tax Act with respect to dividends from corporations, the imposition of new individual and corporate surtaxes, the introduction of a refundable federal sales tax credit, the removal of inventory allowances, amendments with respect to registered retirement savings plans and registered retirement income funds, the introduction of "at risk" rules respecting limited partnerships, a corporate income tax rate reduction, reduction of investment tax credits and the introduction of the alternative minimum tax.

The following is a discussion of the areas of concern to your Committee.

Alternative Minimum Tax (AMT) (Clause 51)

Starting in 1986, income tax for individuals will be calculated in two ways:

- 1) as heretofore, taking into account various deductions, exemptions and tax credits provided under Part I of the Income Tax Act; and
- 2) by readjusting taxable income to add back various tax preferences and, to the extent that this adjusted amount exceeds $40,000, to calculate federal tax at the rate of 17% on the excess.

Taxpayers will have to pay tax equal to the higher of the two amounts.

In order to recognize fluctuating incomes and tax liabilities of individuals, the amount by which the AMT exceeds regular tax for a year may be carried forward to offset regular tax payable over the following seven years to the extent that the regular tax payable exceeds the AMT in those later years.

The Committee has the following comments with respect to the AMT:

- 1) The AMT has been described as unnecessarily complicating our tax system. Individual taxpayers find it difficult to determine their tax position when, for example, they are making a large charitable donation. Some large accounting firms have computer programs which allow a taxpayer to instantly determine his tax position but such service is available to very few.

However, it is noted that despite efforts to reduce or eliminate tax shelters, they continue to proliferate and it would seem that the only way of ensuring that each individual pays his or her fair share is to proceed by an alternative minimum tax.

- 2) Certain investments made prior to 1986 such as multiple unit residential building investments will continue to create deductions which may be denied or deferred by the application of the AMT. Individuals making such investments did so in the belief that they would be entitled to the deductions which were available to them at the time the investment was made.

Some people have objected to the imposition of the AMT in a retrospective manner. It is to be noted that these provisions will only affect taxpayers who made sufficient tax shelter investments prior to 1986 which, together with other deductions available in 1986, could reduce their taxable income below $40,000 for 1986 and following years.

- 3) There may be inequitable application of the AMT in some instances on the death of a taxpayer. There is provision for a three-year carryback provision that will allow the AMT on death to be applied to the excess, if any, of regular Part 1 tax or AMT for the three preceding years.

This relief may be of no assistance to taxpayers who have no regular Part 1 tax to pay in the preceding three years because of loss carry-forwards. Furthermore, the three-year relief may be of little help to taxpayers who have never paid much regular Part 1 tax because of low income. This may impact farmers in particular who have paid little Part 1 tax during their lifetimes and may incur a very large AMT when they die, owing to the inclusion of the untaxed capital gain net of the capital gain exemption claimed on the deemed disposition of their farms at death. This is of concern to the Committee and the Department of Finance officials have indicated that they are studying means of providing relief.

Submission of the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association and the Life Underwriters of Canada

The Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association (CLHIA) objects to putting money-purchase pension plans and RRSPs on an equal footing with respect to tax deductions. They argue that this helps only those higher income Canadians who are making maximum RRSP contributions. They would encourage the expansion of employer-sponsored pension plans which would benefit lower income employees, many of whom are women or part-time workers who often have little or no retirement savings. The CLHIA urges an increase of the tax deductible contribution limit for money-purchase pension plans by the same $2,000 that the RRSP limits are being increased by to maintain some tax incentives for pension plans. They also request that self-employed persons have the right to deduct from taxable income contributions to a pension plan.

The Committee understands the new proposals to be a first step in the implementation of pension reform which is more fully reflected in the Notice of Ways and Means Motion to amend the Income Tax Act tabled on 9th October, 1986. The provisions of Bill C-23 under discussion are part of the objective of the Government to provide fairer and more flexible tax treatment for retirement savings by Canadians and the Committee welcomes this initiative.

Both the CLHIA and the Life Underwriters Association of Canada (LUAC) object to the proposal that individuals be entitled to commute their RRSP annuities and RRIFs. They argue that members of private pension plans and the Canada and Quebec pension plans are not allowed to withdraw their savings. They also argue that it would be unwise to allow individuals to deplete their retirement funds by "squandering money on lavish holidays and other amenities". In their opinion, such individuals could require government assistance in the form of the Guaranteed Income Supplement, thereby becoming a burden on Canadian taxpayers. They contend that retirement savings cannot be regarded as simply the property of the annuitant since all Canadians have, in effect, paid for the tax deferral of such annuitants.

The Committee notes that there are some fundamental differences between RRSPs and company sponsored pension plans. RRSPs are plans entered into voluntarily by individuals with voluntary contributions up to maximum limits. Company sponsored pension plans are usually compulsory as a condition of employment. While it is acknowledged that there will be some cases where individuals will commute their annuities in an irresponsible manner, the Committee is confident that the vast majority of Canadians will be careful to protect their long-term interests. Having made contributions to a voluntary plan, individuals would be entitled to commute should their circumstances change. In many cases, there will be a disincentive to commute as the taxpayer will be subject to tax immediately on the full amount received and probably at higher rates than would have otherwise been applicable. The purpose of the legislation is to give people the right to make their own decisions rather than being forced by legislation to remain committed to receive annuity payments in circumstances which may not be appropriate.

Submission by the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada

The Independent Petroleum Association of Canada (IPAC) submitted a number of recommendations with respect to flow-through shares. Flow-through shares are a mechanism which enable certain resource companies incurring exploration and development expenses to enter into arrangements with outside investors whereby the resource companies forego the tax benefit of the expenses and transfer them to investors who are treated as having incurred the expenses themselves. However, in order to take advantage of the deductions, investors have to incur the expenses themselves which would render investors vulnerable to liabilities arising out of the exploration programme undertaken. New provisions are being introduced with the Bill which will permit investors in flow-through shares to avoid exposure to liabilities associated with resource exploration and development activities.

The Committee has noted the following with respect to IPAC's submission:

- 1) The Income Tax Act provides for a reduction in a taxpayer's Canadian Exploration Expenses (CEE), Canadian Development Expenses (CDE) and Canadian Oil and Gas Property Expenses (COGDE) by the amount of assistance a taxpayer has received or is entitled to receive with respect to specified expenses or activities after 1980. The Act requires a reduction in respect of assistance from a government, municipality or public authority. Sub-clause 11(5) of the Bill defines assistance to include assistance received or receivable from a "person, government, municipality or public authority".

This broad definition was proposed in order to include "kickbacks" which might be received by a resource company from a service corporation as a form of assistance. However, it seems to the Committee that the breadth of the definition is such that it could inadvertently include legitimate assistance. At the very least, the broad definition could cause taxpayers unnecessary expenses and delay in obtaining rulings in cases of doubt.

- 2) Sub-clause 11(4) of the Bill includes draft sub-section 66(12.68) which would require an issuer of flow-through shares to file an information return in prescribed form together with a copy of the selling instrument or agreement on or before the last day of the month following the earlier of (i) the month in which the agreement to issue shares was entered into and (ii) the month in which the selling instrument is first delivered to a potential investor. If an issuer should fail for any reason to meet this deadline, the issuer would only be entitled to renounce CEE, CDE, and COGPE "after it has complied with sub-section 66(12.68)".

It has been argued that a flow-through share financing could be closed, the issuer could fail to comply with the time deadline and flow-through share investors could be denied any resource deductions. While it is recognized that the Government needs such information quickly in order to prevent SRTC-like abuses, the penalty may be too severe and unreasonable. The penalty is also inappropriate because it penalizes the investors rather than the issuer. It would seem to the Committee more equitable to allow investors their resource deductions but to impose a severe penalty on the issuer should it fail to meet the filing deadline.

Surtax on Individuals and Corporations

In order to reduce the federal deficit, the Bill proposes a surtax of 3% on the basic federal tax of individuals beginning on 1st July, 1986 (clause 67) and a 3% surtax on Federal Income Tax payable by all corporations beginning 1st January, 1987 (clause 45). There is no termination date for these surtaxes in the Bill, but the Minister has announced his intention that the surtaxes would continue until the reform of the federal sales tax.

It is to be noted that individuals will bear the greater burden of surtaxes. Individuals in higher income tax brackets will pay more proportionately than corporations because their marginal rates will be higher. It is expected that individual surtaxes will increase federal revenues by $1.2 billion in 1987 and corporate surtaxes will increase federal revenues by $390 million in the same year.

Conclusion

Your Committee has reviewed the subject-matter of Bill C-23 in accordance with the Order of Reference and, except as noted above, has no comment to make.

BELL CANADA REORGANIZATION

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-13

TUESDAY, December 16, 1986

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

EIGHTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of the Bill C-13, intituled: "An Act respecting the reorganization of Bell Canada", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, 30th October, 1986, examined the subject-matter of the said Bill and now reports as follows:

In connection with this reference, your Committee received submissions and heard testimony from eight organizations, including representatives of Bell Canada, the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC), consumer groups, communications workers, and business users and producers of telecommunications goods and services (see Appendices).

Rationale and Main Provisions of the Bill

Bill C-13 has been prompted by two related events: the continuance of Bell Canada under the Canada Business Corporations Act (CBCA), which took effect in April 1982, and the reorganization of Bell Canada implemented in April 1983. Bell Canada had originally been incorporated under its own act (an Act respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, S.C. 1880, C.67), and the limitations on its activities had been set out in this Act. Bell's continuance under the CBCA raised concerns that the limits set out in its Special Act may no longer apply. The first 10 clauses of the Bill restate the provisions in the Special Act in order to restore whatever regulatory authority over Bell Canada may have been removed by the continuance.

The remaining three clauses are new and stem from the reorganization of Bell. The effect of the reorganization was to replace Bell Canada by Bell Canada Enterprises Inc. (BCE) as the new parent company of the Bell Group of companies. Prior to the reorganization, legislation with respect to Bell Canada applied to all Bell companies insofar as this was necessary for the regulation of Bell Canada. With the reorganization, Bell's affiliates have been removed from the regulatory purview of CRTC. The intent of the new provisions in the Bill is to ensure that this reorganization does not impair CRTC's ability to regulate the activities of Bell Canada pursuant to its mandate under the Railway Act and the National Transportation Act.

- Clause 11 would require BCE to obtain CRTC approval for the sale of Bell Canada shares if such a sale would reduce BCE's ownership of Bell to less than 80%. This would enable the Commission to review any future reorganization of Bell to ensure that the interests of subscribers are safeguarded.
- Clause 12 would empower CRTC to obtain from BCE such information as it deems necessary for the regulation of Bell Canada.
- Clause 13 would authorize CRTC to direct Bell Canada to divest itself of any competitive telecommunications activity, or to take over from an affiliate activities which are not sufficiently competitive. The purpose of this power is to ensure that Bell could not a) subsidize competitive activities with revenues from monopoly services, or b) escape regulation of certain activities by shifting them to non-regulated affiliates.

Testimony heard

With the exception of Bell Canada, all the witnesses appearing before the Committee expressed support for the Bill with few reservations.

Bell Canada took the position that the Bill is unnecessary and should therefore be withdrawn: clauses 5, 6 and 9 of the Bill, which define Bell's responsibilities as a telecommunications carrier and place the company under federal jurisdiction, should, in Bell's view, be included in new telecommunications legislation generally applicable to all federally regulated enterprises. The remaining sections, Bell submitted, would unfairly impede Bell's ability to compete in an increasingly competitive environment.

The Company directed its strongest criticism to clause 13. It complained that the provisions empowering CRTC to direct Bell Canada to take over an activity being carried on by an affiliated company amount to an "invasion of the company's right to decide what business it wants to carry on and in what manner it wishes to carry it on." Conversely, Bell argued that authorizing CRTC to order Bell Canada to divest itself of a particular activity would inhibit the Company's ability to provide necessary services. Existing cost-accounting instruments, in Bell's view, allow CRTC to determine and prevent cross-subsidization: the proposed new powers would therefore be superfluous. On this point, Bell Canada was supported by the Communications and Electrical Workers of Canada who expressed concern about the possible effects of divestiture on the working conditions, job security and bargaining rights of Bell Canada employees.

All other witnesses before the Committee argued that the "in" and "out" powers under clause 13 are necessary to safeguard the interests of subscribers and competitors from predatory practices by Bell. They made the point that, in the absence of the "in" powers, it may be possible for Bell to remove from regulation certain monopoly activities by shifting them to unregulated affiliates. The provision of an electronic telephone book through a separate company was cited as one possible example. Conversely, competitive activities might be located within Bell Canada because of the increased opportunity to subsidize them from monopoly revenues to the detriment of Bell's subscribers and competitors. It cannot be certain, these witnesses argued, that accounting rules will allow a proper separation of costs in all cases; the ability to order structural remedies, therefore, should also be available. It is relevant to note that the "in" and "out" powers under clause 13 would only be available to the extent required by CRTC to fulfill its regulatory mandate under the Railway Act, and that decisions of CRTC are subject to appeal to the courts and to the Governor in Council.

The one other section of the Bill which received substantial comment was clause 12. Most witnesses took the view that the wording of that clause should be amended to state explicitly that CRTC will have authority to obtain information not only from the controlling parent of Bell but also from Bell's affiliated companies. CRTC officials, however, testified that such an amendment was unnecessary because the present wording in clause 12 would provide CRTC with authority to obtain, through BCE, any relevant information pertaining to a Bell Canada affiliate. They cited the case of Interprovincial Pipe Lines Ltd. v. The National Energy Board [1978] 1 F.C. 601 in which the Federal Court of Appeal ruled that IPL had to provide to NEB, in a meaningful form, information involving an IPL subsidiary located in the U.S. In light of this, it is the Committee's view that the provisions of clause 12 as they stand are adequate for the purpose intended.

Conclusion

The continuance of Bell under the CBCA and the reorganization of the company have raised legitimate concerns about the ability of CRTC to exercise its mandate set out in the Railway Act and the National Transportation Act. The provisions in Bill C-13 represent a necessary and adequate response to those concerns.

Your Committee has reviewed the subject-matter of Bill C-13 in accordance with the Order of Reference and, except as noted above, has no comment to make.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE

THIRD REPORT

REPORT ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1987

TUESDAY, December 16, 1986

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

THIRD REPORT

Your Committee, to which Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1987, were referred, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, November 6, 1986 submits its report as follows:

The Committee heard evidence from the following witnesses from Treasury Board:

Mr. Gerard Veilleux, Secretary;

Mr. Allan Darling, Deputy Secretary, Program Branch.

In addition to the Committee's assessment of these Supplementary Estimates, this report contains additional information which was prepared by Treasury Board as a result of an agreement between the Chairman and the former Secretary of the Treasury Board, Mr. J.L. Manion. The information contained in the appendices is classified under the following six section headings.

1. Highlights of Supplementary Estimates (A), 1986-87;
2. Summary of Expenditure Framework and Estimates for 1986-87;
3. Statutory Items Included in Supplementary Estimates (C), 1986-87;
4. Summary of Voted Items (greater than $5 million) Included in Supplementary Estimates (A), 1986-87;
5. List of One-dollar Votes Included in Supplementary Estimates (A), 1986-87 and Additional Explanations; and
6. Items in Supplementary Estimates (A), 1986-87 which Materially differ from Information Provided in the 1986-87 Part III.

The Committee also wishes to report that the current Secretary of the Treasury Board has agreed to continue the practice of his predecessor; Treasury Board will provide written responses to the comments and recommendations contained in the Committee's reports to the Senate on the Estimates.

Supplementary Estimates (A), totalling $339.3 million is the first Supplementary Estimate for the 1986-87 year. This sum is composed of $507 million in requests for new spending authority and an expected lapse in statutory expenditures of $168 million. The seven items which make up the statutory requests are described in Appendix three. Regarding the forty-two items to be voted, each of those having a value of greater than $5 million is described in Appendix four. The Committee was informed that there are twenty-four one-dollar votes included in these Estimates; twenty-one authorize the transfer of funds from one vote to another; the remaining three votes are consistent with enabling legislation and a Speaker of the House ruling. These are described in Appendix five.

These Supplementary Estimates bring the total Estimates for the year to $107.8 billion. Viewed another way, these Estimates bring the total statutory expenditures for the year to $69.7 billion or 64.7% of the total Estimates, and the voted expenditures to $38.1 billion or 35.3%. A summary of the Main and Supplementary Estimates for 1986-87 showing cumulative totals is shown in Appendix two.

The remainder of this report focuses on two specific issues which the Committee addressed in its deliberations on these Estimates. These two issues are in addition to the many questions pursued by members of the Committee, some of which were answered by the witnesses to the satisfaction of the Committee while others will be responded to in writing at a later date.

Treasury Board - Government Contingencies - Vote 5

Through the Main Estimates, Treasury Board was allotted $350 million for government contingencies through Vote 5. The purpose of this vote, as stated in the Treasury Board 1986-87 Estimates, Part III is:

"to provide funding for increased salary costs arising out of negotiated and non-negotiated agreements and other payroll requirements not included in departmental Estimates and for urgent expenditures of a miscellaneous character which cannot be foreseen when Estimates are drawn up." (pp.3-9)

In the proposed Schedule to the Appropriations Bill presented in the 1986-87 Estimates, Part II, the description of Vote 5 contains no reference to "urgent" expenditures. According to the Part II, this vote is to be used, in part, "to provide for miscellaneous minor and unforeseen expenses". In the Committee's view, there is a difference between "unforeseen" expenses and "urgent" expenses. Therefore we recommend that Treasury Board examine the use of Vote 5, clarify its purpose, and redraft Parts II and III of future Estimates to insure consistency between them.

Since the introduction of this vote in 1970-71, approximately 1% of all budgetary expenditures in the Main Estimates has been deemed sufficient to cover government contingencies under Vote 5. Table 1 illustrates this relationship for the past three years:

Table 1
Comparison of Government Contingencies to Main Estimates
Budgetary Expenditures ($million)

	1986-87	1985-86	1984-85
Budgetary Expenditures	37,550	36,910	36,830
Government Contingencies	350	340	315
% of Budgetary Expenditures	0.9	0.9	0.9

All allotments made from this vote, with the exception of unforeseen salary adjustments, are recovered from departments through Supplementary Estimates. Because this vote is used like a revolving account which lapses at the end of each fiscal year, the original amount can be re-circulated yielding a gross allotment far in excess of the original allocation. Table 2 illustrates the extent to which the gross and the original allotment vary, and how the salary adjustment component has declined while the "urgent or unforeseen" expenditures have grown.

Table 2
Comparison of Original Allotment in Vote 5 to Actual Use
For Salary Adjustment and Urgent Expenditures ($million)

	80-81	81-82	82-83	83-84	84-85	85-86
Original Allotment*	200	280	315	315	315	340
Salary adjustment	147	182	65	13	27	11
Urgent (unforeseen) expenditure allotment	213	261	433	499	528	531
Gross allotment	360	443	498	512	555	542

* voted by Parliament through Main Estimates as Government Contingencies - Vote 5

This table shows that between 1980-81 and 1985-86, the use of the salary adjustment component has declined some 13 fold from $147 million to $11 million while the use of the "urgent or unforeseen" expenditures provision has increased approximately two and a half times from $213 million to $531 million.

Officials of Treasury Board explained that the salary adjustment component had declined so rapidly because inflation rates had become more predictable in the 1980s, in partial response to the government's "six-and-five" program. But regarding the sizeable growth in the "urgent or unforeseen" expenditures, officials could only say that this was a matter of policy and the responsibility of ministers. The Committee concluded that because of the ambiguity of the use of this allotment and the lack of guidelines, Vote 5 is susceptible to abuse. Accordingly the Committee recommends that Treasury Board draw up guidelines for the use of the "urgent or unforeseen" component of Vote 5. This would allow Parliament to scrutinize more closely the use of this allotment.

Commissions of Inquiry

These Supplementary Estimates did not contain any reference to the costs of the Parker Commission. Treasury Board officials indicated that they anticipate such an item in the next supplementary estimates. The Committee learned that with any inquiry under the Inquiries Act, there are virtually no expenditure guidelines. While standards which are approved by Treasury Board apply to such items as living and travel expenses, no such guidelines exist regarding other potentially expensive items such as the legal costs of witnesses and the length or extensiveness of an inquiry. These are left to the Commissioner(s) of the Inquiry and the Minister responsible for the department to which the costs are to be charged. The Committee was concerned about the open-endedness and the lack of guidelines for such inquiries. It may be that such flexibility is necessary to allow inquiries to follow their natural course, but it may also be necessary to re-examine the open-endedness of these guidelines and the use of the Inquiries Act.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC
Chairman

APPENDIX 1 TO REPORT

HIGHLIGHTS OF SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES "A" 1986-87

This Supplementary Estimate, totalling $339 million is the first Supplementary Estimate for the year 1986-87. It brings total Estimates for the year-to-date to $107.8 billion. Of this total $107.6 billion represents budgetary Estimates. This is well within the projected budgetary Estimates level of $110 billion forecast in the February Budget and identified in Part I of the 1986-87 Main Estimates.

Major items included in these Supplementary Estimates are:

- $108.9 million for increased expenditures under the Indian and Inuit Affairs Program;
- $76.4 million in voted appropriations under the Agri-Food Program of Agriculture Canada;

- $56 million in statutory expenditures under the Agri-Food Program of Agriculture Canada;
- $36.1 million for increased expenditures in the Employment and Insurance Program;
- $31.6 million for Labour Canada in statutory payments for labour adjustment assistance benefits;
- $30.9 million for increased expenditures in the Immigration Program;
- $29 million in payments to the Canadian Film Development Corporation;
- $26.2 million in budgetary appropriations in the Native Claims Program;
- $25.3 million for Supply and Services Canada for payments to financial institutions for services provided to the Receiver General for Canada;
- $20.4 million in non-budgetary expenditures in the Energy Program;
- $20.3 million for expenditures in the Northern Affairs Program;
- a reduction of $263 million in statutory non-budgetary payments to the Export Development Corporation.

There are two additional points that might be of interest:

a) These Supplementary Estimates contain twenty-four, one dollar Votes of which twenty-one are entirely financial in nature in that they seek authority to transfer funds between Votes or to establish or adjust grants within a Vote. In each of these cases an explanation of the new requirement and an indication of the source of funds is provided in the Supplementary Estimates. The remaining three Votes seek specific authorities, consistent with enabling legislation and the Speaker's rulings on legislating in the Estimates. A detailed listing of these Votes along with additional explanations has been provided to members.

b) Supplementary Estimates have traditionally informed Parliament of the person-year requirements associated with the items included. These Supplementary Estimates contain 593 person-years for 1986-87. The Treasury Board will ensure that person-years included in Supplementary Estimates throughout this year are offset by a lapse of person-year authorities elsewhere in government. These additional person-years will not jeopardize the government's plans to reduce the size of the public service. As previously announced, the total Treasury Board controlled person-years as set out each year in the Main Estimates were reduced by approximately two percent in 1986-87. Further reductions of one percent a year for the next four years will bring the total person-year reductions to 15,000 by 1990-91.

of Canadair Financial Corporation to a limit of $1.35 billion. The vote does not affect loans already in place and it does not rescind the authority of the Minister of Finance, on behalf of the Government, to enter into agreements with lenders to Canadair Financial Corporation to assume the Company's existing debt obligations.

Regional Industrial Expansion

Vote L25a—To extend the purposes of Regional Industrial Expansion Vote L25, Appropriation Act No. 2, 1986-87 to allow the Minister of RIE to take stock options in connection with the Atlantic Enterprise Program.

Explanation—To increase the level of Ministerial authority provided in previous appropriation Acts to allow the Minister to take a stock option in connection with a loan guaranteed or contribution made towards the interest on a loan under the Atlantic Enterprise Program where in his opinion the Crown's interest should be protected or the Crown should benefit from the purchase. Before this authority can be exercised the Atlantic Enterprise Program Loan Insurance Regulations must be amended.

Additional Explanation

Category C - Miscellaneous $1.00 Votes:

External Affairs - Canadian International Development Agency

Vote L45a—To seek increased authority to issue notes to international financial institution fund accounts in the amount of $64,000,000.

Explanation—The enabling legislation is the International Development (Financial Institution) Continuing Assistance Act which requires that the Secretary of State for External Affairs seek authority to issue non-interest bearing, non-negotiable demand notes.

Authority may be sought to issue notes to other institutions which may be added as approved by the Governor in Council. The two Funds under consideration, namely the Asian Development Fund and the African Development Fund, were included in the original legislation.

Authority must be sought through an Appropriation from Parliament in the year for which these notes are required.

Subsequent encashment of these notes in future years are reported to Parliament as statutory expenditures. The funds for these costs are contained in the overall Official Development Assistance allocation as shown in the Budget tabled in the House each year by the Minister of Finance.

The issuance of notes allows these organizations to make commitments to developing countries for the financing of projects and programs designed to assist in their economic and social development.

Regional Industrial Expansion

Vote 2a—To repeal the guarantee of loans to Canadair Financial Corporation Inc.

Explanation—To rescind existing authorities included in previous appropriation Acts which allow the Minister to guarantee borrowings

APPENDIX 6 TO REPORT

ITEMS IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES "A" 1986-87 WHICH MATERIALLY DIFFER FROM INFORMATION PROVIDED IN THE 1986-87 PART III

While the following list may not be totally exhaustive, it identifies those items in Supplementary Estimates "A" 1986-87 which are known to significantly impact on or alter information previously included in Part III's.

Employment & Immigration

—These Supplementary Estimates include $3.3M for the Employment Creation Grants and Contributions program. The 1986-87 Part III referred to the fact that this program had expired at the end of last fiscal year. The program has since been extended for one year (i.e. to the end of 1986-87) to allow for completion of projects underway. This Supplementary Estimate reflects that extension.

Forestry

—These Supplementary Estimates include $2.9M for the human resource component of the forestry sector strategy. Again the Part III referred to the expiration of this program which has since been extended for a one-year period.

Solicitor General

—The 1986-87 Part III identifies reductions in Estimates for Crime Prevention initiatives due to the termination of an expansion to the program and provision of additional resources in support of these initiatives. These Supplementary Estimates include $1.6M for the extension to 1990 of the expanded program.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, December 17, 1986

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.
Prayers.

THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as you are obviously aware, there is no Hansard or Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate available today. I have asked the Table to try to ascertain what the problem is and how quickly we can expect to have it corrected.

In the meantime, copies of the order paper have been made and have been circulated. We will just have to try to work with that for now.

[Translation]

THE HONOURABLE LOUIS DE GONZAGUE GIGUÈRE
THE HONOURABLE RENAUE LAPOINTE, P.C.

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM THE SENATE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): Honourable senators, I have never been a great supporter of the laws of this country that prescribe a compulsory retirement age. Like everyone else, I await with increasing apprehension the day it will be my turn, but I find these rules particularly regrettable because they often deprive us of our most able and dedicated senators. Since I came to the Senate in September 1979, I have seen to my great chagrin the forced departure of Allister Grosart, George McIlraith, Richard Donahoe, John Connolly and Eric Cook, to mention only a few senators who, at the time of their retirement, were still among the most active and most respected of our colleagues.

Today, I have the melancholy duty to pay tribute to two of those colleagues who because of this unfortunate provision will soon be leaving us. I am of course referring to Senators Louis de Gonzague Giguère and Renaude Lapointe.

Senator Lapointe is of course the younger of the two senators.

She will be retiring from this chamber on January 3, while Senator Giguère will be 75 tomorrow.

I find it ironic and rather sad that these two senators who will shortly reach the age of official retirement, reflect in both spirit and appearance the energy and vigour of youth.

Senator Giguère was the first person to be appointed to the Senate by Pierre Elliott Trudeau when he became Prime Minister. The senator was appointed to this chamber on September 10, 1968, before the Trudeau government started its first session.

His appointment was not surprising, considering Mr. Giguère's impressive career in business and of course in public affairs.

In 1954, he became founding secretary of the Canadian Institute of Public Affairs. In 1963, he became administrator, and then member, of the Executive Committee of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Our colleague was very active on the political scene. He was the Liberal Party's chief organizer for Quebec during the federal elections in 1963, 1965 and 1968, with disastrous results for my own party, as we all know. He was also instrumental in setting up the Liberal Federation of Canada in Quebec, in 1964.

Senator Giguère is certainly not the only political organizer to grace the benches of this august institution, but he is certainly one of the most successful ones. Now that he is about to retire from the Senate, I was most interested to see that apparently he has every intention of remaining an active participant in the affairs of his party. In an interview that appeared in the press early this week, Senator Giguère commented with his usual flair and frankness on the activities and personalities of the Liberal Party today.

I wish him health and happiness, and I may say that we are looking forward with a great deal of interest to future comments on the affairs of the Liberal Party. Perhaps some day, he will put his thoughts to paper, as many of his Liberal colleagues have done.

Senator Lapointe started a brilliant journalistic career in 1939 at the Quebec City daily, Le Soleil.

She was also Quebec correspondent for Time and Life, in addition to preparing reports for the CBC International Service.

At the time, journalism was not one of the best paid professions, and she had to juggle several jobs to make ends meet.

She left Quebec City in 1959, on her way to the provincial metropolis where she became the first woman ever to join the editorial staff of Montreal's La Presse.

In 1961 she followed Jean-Louis Gagnon to the Nouveau Journal where she wrote a series of 30 articles on Mgr. Joseph Charbonneau, the former bishop of Montreal. Indeed the information gathered by Renaude Lapointe was the framework of "Charbonneau et le chef", a theatre play which proved to be very successful in the 1970s.

When the Nouveau Journal folded in 1962 our colleague went back to the daily newspaper La Presse. Three years later she became the first woman editor of the paper.

Senator Lapointe has always been a controversial editorial writer: unconditional federalist as she was, she never failed to move her readers. I am told she did not disagree with Claude Ryan when he said she was more a polemicist than an editorial writer.

Even at that time Renaude Lapointe was an active Liberal. In a recent interview she admitted that when she was working for La Presse she wrote political editorials in Canadien libéral under the pseudonym Carole.

Renaude Lapointe joined the Senate in 1971. In 1974, during International Women's Year, she was appointed Speaker of the Senate. In 1979 she became a member of the Privy Council.

Senator Lapointe has always been friendly and generous. When she left the speakership of the Senate she was given a gift and made "honorary mother hen" of all parliamentary associations because of her great availability.

I had the opportunity—rather I was fortunate enough—to get better acquainted with Renaude Lapointe. I worked with her on the Senate foreign affairs committee. With several of our colleagues we travelled to various regions of Canada, the United States and the Middle East. In my estimation, she was always Canada's best ambassador for this house, a living example of everything we feel is good and admirable in this country.

In saying farewell—or perhaps I should just say so long—and thanking her for her priceless contribution to the Senate, I would like to borrow and use for the last time, maybe, an expression which has had some currency in recent years in liberal circles:

[English]

In saying farewell to Senator Lapointe, I would like to borrow and use for the last time an expression that has had some currency in Liberal circles in recent years and tell her that so far as the Senate is concerned, she will always be first in our hearts.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Murray has spoken so eloquently of our two departing colleagues that what I will add will be personal impressions, because he has already outlined in detail the outstanding careers of both Senators Giguère and Lapointe.

It is true that the 1965 constitutional amendment is the cause of the departure of our two colleagues. It is unlikely that there will ever be a reversal of that decision by a new constitutional amendment that would permit age to be disregarded and instead substitute ability to contribute as the test.

Senator Murray: Alas!

Senator MacEachen: Indeed, if it were not for the constitutional amendment of 1965, the provisions of the Charter itself might come into play on the grounds of age discrimination. However, inasmuch as this particular discriminatory provision is found in the Constitution itself, then there seems to be no remedy. On second thought, there is, in fact, a remedy and that is if we take the future in our hands and decide to have an elected Senate, then this bar to future service would cease to exist.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: Then we would see senators like Senators Renaude Lapointe and Louis Giguère continue to serve their country.

Senator Murray has made reference to the career of Senator Giguère. All I want to say is that I first met Senator Giguère when he was an organizer for and active in the affairs of the Liberal Party during the period of the prime ministership and leadership of Mr. Pearson. Senator Giguère told me that his best friend was the late Maurice Lamontagne and that it was Maurice who recruited Senator Giguère because of the organizational talent he had exhibited in Quebec in establishing the first branch of the Institute of Public Affairs. Of course, the rest of the story is well known.

Senator Giguère succeeded in his organizational efforts and was subsequently appointed to the Senate by Mr. Trudeau, as Senator Murray has pointed out, in September, 1968. He had worked in an important period in our political history, one which saw the Liberal Party regain office and transfer the leadership from the late Mr. Pearson to Mr. Trudeau.

Senator Lapointe has, in a sense, reversed modern contemporary Liberal practice—she has put her thoughts on paper before entering politics rather than after leaving. Perhaps that is a habit that ought to be more widely emulated. It is true that, as Senator Murray has pointed out, she had an extremely effective career as a journalist and editorialist. She wielded an incisive and direct writing style. I am told that when asked by the Prime Minister if she would come to the Senate, she was reluctant to accept the appointment. Her first reaction was to say no, because she thought she might be bored in the Senate. Who would ever think that, except one who had not been in the midst of the excitement that generally prevails in this institution?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: Although Senator Lapointe had second thoughts, she became an effective, hard-working senator. She served as Speaker of the Senate and, in that capacity, as Senator Flynn on an earlier occasion pointed out, she became "an outstanding ambassador for the Senate." Senator Murray also referred to that fact. Certainly she was an extremely valuable representative of Canada not only as Speaker of the Senate but as a senator. That is but one of the many contributions she has made to our country.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I regret the departure of both of our colleagues, but I am optimistic enough to believe that there is life hereafter, even after the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Yvette Rousseau: Honourable senators, Senators Giguère and Lapointe will leave this house in a few weeks, after deeply dedicated political careers. We will especially regret Senator Lapointe's departure. First French Canadian woman to be appointed Speaker of the Senate, she had been also, throughout her newspaper and political career, at the forefront of many Canadian and Quebec women who, through their talent and dedication, have achieved national and international status.

Following studies in music, languages, literature and sociology, Renaude Lapointe made a name for herself as a reporter for Le Soleil daily newspaper. A highly respected music and drama critic, Senator Lapointe also served as correspondent for such American magazines as Time, Life, and Variety. To that must be added her remarkable contribution to the international network of the CBC.

In 1959, she left Le Soleil for the Montreal daily La Presse where she became the first woman reporter to cover current events. Some seven years later, she was appointed editorial writer.

From April, 1970 to November, 1971, Senator Lapointe worked as information officer for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Then she was appointed to the Senate. During her fifteen years as senator, Senator Lapointe showed much interest in various fields. Bilingualism, the Canadian Film Development Corporation, the Old Age Security pension, the Senate Reform and the United Nations are but some of her preferred topics.

However, it is certainly as Canadian representative to various international organizations that Senator Lapointe really made her mark.

Immediately upon her being appointed to the Senate, she became a member of the Senate Standing Committees on Foreign Affairs and Legal and Constitutional Affairs. She participated very actively in the activities of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, l'Association des parlementaires de langue française, the Canadian Association of NATO and the Inter-Parliamentary Union.

Three years after her appointment to the Senate, Senator Lapointe was asked to assume the duties of Speaker. She did so with a remarkable insight and a sense of duty which enhanced the very dignity of her role as Speaker. Indeed, the Speaker must first of all lead the debates of the Senate, but he must also welcome the ambassadors and distinguished visitors who generally pay a call on the Senate after being entertained by the Prime Minister. In this optic, the newspapers were justified in designating you, Senator Lapointe, as "the Ambassador of the Senate."

Senator Lapointe also fought in her own way for many years to improve the status of women. In doing so, she was in the forefront of those who defended the cause of women at a time when the women's movement was only beginning. However, her main concern was the defence of Canadian unity. She was the author of many articles on the subject published in the newspaper La Presse in the late sixties, and at the time of the repatriation of the Canadian Constitution in 1982, she took a very active part in the debate because of her concern for the future of her country.

Her colleagues in the Senate will remember Renaude Lapointe as a woman whose charm and grace extend beyond political boundaries.

Your leaving, Senator Lapointe, is certainly not an easy thing. However, your colleagues are not really worried. Hard worker that you are, you will be able to find new challenges.

In closing, I would like to express personally all my gratitude for the way you have served both your country and its Parliament. Your honesty and frankness, which have always been apparent in your work, are your most precious legacy to us. We all wish to thank you today.

I join my colleagues in expressing to you, Senator Lapointe, my best wishes for health, peace and many more years of useful service to the Canadian community.

I also extend the same wishes to Senator Giguère.

[English]

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, during my years in the Senate I have always confined myself on these occasions to paying tribute to retiring senators from my own province. However, if I may crave your indulgence, I will make an exception in these two instances.

In the case of Senator Giguère, I first worked closely with Bob in the period referred to by Senator MacEachen, during the Pearson years, when he was campaign chairman for the Liberal Party in the province of Quebec and I held a similar position in British Columbia. He was a man of remarkable organizational ability, and also a man of coolness and precision, from whom I learned a great deal. I should like to pay tribute to him for the association we had in those days.

My affection for Senator Lapointe is more deep, more lasting and more recent, because some time after coming to the Senate I was fortunate enough to be appointed Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which committee Senator Lapointe has been one of the longest serving and most effective members. Her dedication to the work of that committee has been quite remarkable. Many of you will know that she is exceptionally dedicated in her attendance, and does not take up the time of the committee with unnecessary interventions, but when she does intervene her interventions are absolutely to the point. Her questions elicit information that otherwise would not be forthcoming from the witness. She has been of particular assistance to us always when drafting reports, when, similarly, her input would be pithy, to the point and of very great assistance insofar as the editorializing of those reports was concerned, to say nothing of the fact that she voluntarily took on the duty of supervising the translation of those reports. So, I owe Senator Lapointe a very great debt for her contribution to the Foreign Affairs Committee all these years, and she will be sorely missed by it.

● (1420)

On a lighter note, I can recall that as Speaker of this chamber she helped lead a small delegation of Canadian parliamentarians to Japan. The delegation was led by the Speakers of both chambers. I think it was the first time that a Canadian parliamentary delegation had gone to Japan. Of course, and quite understandably, the Japanese looked upon this delegation with exceptional interest because of this leadership. As a result, instead of being put up at a hotel, we were put up at the Akasaka Palace. Senator Lapointe, very appropriately, was put up in the same room that Queen Elizabeth had occupied only a few weeks, or months at the most, before. I was privileged to be in the adjoining suite which had been occupied by Prince Philip.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator van Roggen: I am sure that you will all be pleased to know that my wife was with me on the occasion.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

An Hon. Senator: Come on.

Senator van Roggen: I mustn't say, "to my regret."

Senator Lapointe was an outstanding leader of that delegation. Of course, her charm and presence paved the way for most fruitful exchanges with members of the Japanese government at that time.

Renaude, I would just like to say to you, have a very fruitful retirement. I know that you will not be discontinuing your level of activity just because you must leave here at this stage of your life, and that you will continue to do useful work. I will be following your endeavours with great affection.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I want to say that I share the feelings which have already been expressed, especially in the last sentence spoken by Senator van Roggen. Under these circumstances, we have a tendency to pay tribute to a person as though it were the end of a career or a life. This is certainly not the case, especially for Senator Lapointe.

We are very sorry to see her go. I have already thanked her for her faithful co-operation in the last 15 years. I am personally certain, as we should all be, that she will remain very active. I even went as far as to suggest that she should use her activity in a kind of role reversal and be a candidate for the very next elections to the House of Commons!

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I wish to join with the others who have already spoken about our two young retirees. I wish them a happy retirement, which they fully deserve both as senators and even as members of the Liberal Party. Throughout their activities here, they have shown their dedication, ability and availability.

This is not really goodbye because they will always be present and useful. We shall always look for their guidance and precious assistance.

As people say in the country: "Come back soon, now!"

[Senator van Roggen.]

Hon. Renaude Lapointe: Gentlemen leaders, dear colleagues, it is rare indeed that a person should be buried twice, even under flowers and compliments.

This kind of honour has been bestowed upon me: those who attended the Speaker's reception last Wednesday had nothing but praise for me, and today is a repeat performance.

Again I can only say what I expressed the first time with emotion and sincerity: These 15 years in the Senate have to be among the best of my life. I made precious friends, I learned a lot, and I will cherish these memories for ever.

[English]

I beg all of you, dear colleagues, to accept my sincere thanks for your friendship. I really enjoyed your company and it was with pleasure that I worked with many of you on various committees. If I am 15 years older than when I came in, I certainly feel 15 years richer because of the experience and wisdom we shared in this chamber of sober second thought. Because of the happy or sad moments that we lived together, but mainly because of the important political decisions in which we participated, I shall remember all of them, and every one of you. Thank you.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Lapointe, on behalf of the Chair which you have served with such brilliance and distinction, I want to offer to you, and to Senator Giguère, our best wishes for a well-deserved retirement.

You will be sorely missed in the Senate. You were outstanding colleagues. Do come back and see us often, you will always be welcome.

PRIVILEGE

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege and I promise to be brief. However, I felt it was important to correct the record, just for history's sake.

Yesterday, in this chamber, there were references made by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition to an article in a Toronto newspaper which described me as a member of the Liberal Party.

Senator Frith: Good old Toronto paper.

● (1430)

Senator Kelly: I was warmed by the sincerity of the welcome offered by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. I felt it was sincere. I had not made application and there had been no overtures made.

Some peculiar things happened in the last 24 hours. I have not worked this out, because I am Irish and Irish people are slow thinkers; they have to work these things through. In the last 24 hours a number of my Liberal friends called to congratulate me, but I did not receive any calls from Tory friends suggesting I change my mind.

Senator Perrault: They read the polls!

Senator Kelly: Further, I noticed in Hansard—I received an advance copy—that when Senator Frith welcomed me, there was no response from the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, the whip, or, indeed, any other member from the government side. I also have to think that one through!

Senator Frith: It is still not too late.

Senator Kelly: For the record, I want to say that I am conservative by nature and a Tory by political conviction. I might underline that by suggesting something to you that occurred earlier today: I noticed that all of the lights on the beautifully-decorated Christmas tree in the Senate foyer are red. I checked on that and found that that was the result of direct instructions from Senator Frith. I feel I must name the person.

I am too junior in this chamber to take Senator Frith on one on one, so I am going to enlist the assistance of my Terrorist Committee to see if we can find a way to have some balance between blue and red Christmas tree lights next year.

Senator Argue: You will want to paint the carpet next!

Senator Kelly: But seriously, honourable senators—I have to beat this drum all the time—my perception of this place is that I am having trouble feeling comfortable seeing two sides. As far as I am concerned, it does not have two sides. I am a Tory and I will remain a Tory as long as I can see ahead, but most of my partisanship remains outside of this chamber.

I would be honoured to sit on either side of this chamber; I am honoured to sit on this side. I believe the newspapers were, as usual, accusing me of something that was not true.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

THIRTY-SECOND ANNUAL SESSION, ISTANBUL, TURKEY—
NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, January 20, 1987, I will call the attention of the Senate to the Thirty-Second Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held in Istanbul, Turkey, from November 14 to 18, 1986.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I draw to the attention of honourable senators that many have recognized that Canada has a problem in transportation. At this time when the need for downsizing and realignment of the basic rail transportation of this country is so active and so necessary, the morale of railway people is of extreme importance. I would, therefore, ask the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate to use his good offices to ensure that the person to succeed the retiring Chairman of Canadian National Railways is someone who will be recognized by railway people and by transportation people as somebody who knows something about the business.

Senator Argue: Not another politician!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will take note of the representations made by Senator Sinclair and will see that they are conveyed to the Minister of Transport.

In doing so, I simply draw to his attention, and to the attention of other honourable senators, the fact that one of the outstanding chairmen and presidents of Canadian National was Mr. Donald Gordon, who had been in the banking business.

Senator Sinclair: If I may, Donald Gordon was a Scot and had no political affiliation. If you can duplicate that, you will do well.

Senator Murray: I may say that one of the outstanding presidents of the CPR was also a Scot.

Senator Doody: And had no political affiliation!

Senator Frith: And if you can duplicate that, you will do well.

FISHERIES

WEST COAST SALMON ENHANCEMENT PROGRAM—
GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

There are continuing and persistent rumours in western Canada that the government is considering either very major cutbacks in the Salmon Enhancement Program or complete cancellation of the program in order to obtain funds for projects in other parts of the country. I am seeking from the Leader of the Government a commitment that he will bring to this chamber an unequivocal statement that the government will continue this very valuable program on the west coast of Canada and that the rumours are without any foundation.

Senator Frith: It just creates them!

Senator Murray: I will undertake, however, to make inquiries as to the status of the Salmon Enhancement Program.

The honourable senator will realize that if ministers were required to comment on every rumour that is floated on the west coast or elsewhere, they would be doing nothing else.

Senator Perrault: The request is not for confirmation or denial of a rumour; it is for a statement with respect to the Salmon Enhancement Program on the west coast, which is a specific request. The Leader of the Government has access to the information. He can obtain such information from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The reports are serious in that supporters of the government party have provided information to me on this point. I hope he can dispel any such addled notion that such a ridiculous move would be made.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will do my best to dispel all of the honourable senator's addled notions.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

INUVIK—WITHDRAWAL OF ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL— EFFECT ON ECONOMY

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

On Saturday last an article appeared in the Montreal Gazette stating that the Community Council of Inuvik had passed a motion requesting military protection by the United States government. While I think it is understood by everyone that this kind of motion being passed by a council in a community like Inuvik may be a joke, the reasons for its being passed are not a joke. This government has chosen to remove the military and their dependants from Inuvik, which is 700 people out of a community with a population of 3,500. That is 20 per cent of the population. In Toronto such a proportion would represent 600,000 people.

● (1440)

My question is: How could a government be so unfeeling as to remove 20 per cent of a community's population at the very time that they institute an oil policy that has completely devastated the north and has removed any hopes of employment in the north. Senator Flynn may laugh; he would not laugh if he was in Inuvik right now.

Senator Flynn: No; I am laughing at your way of reasoning.

Senator Lucier: Well, you may laugh, but this is very serious to the people of the north, Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: Yes, I know; I hope you put it in a little more sensible way.

[Senator Perrault.]

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: Well, I am putting my question as a representative of the people of the north, not as your representative.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I would like to ask this question in the context of a government that is in the process of spending half a billion dollars in southern Canada to build a Class 8 icebreaker to send up there to represent Canadian sovereignty in the north. You had a Canadian presence up there that was providing employment and contributing money to the economy of the north. Why would you spend half a billion dollars in southern Canada to demonstrate a presence in the north? You already had Canadian representation there. What kind of convoluted thinking is going on with this government?

Senator Argue: No thinking at all.

Senator Murray:—I suggest that the honourable senator take advantage of the first opportunity that presents itself to debate this matter, as he seems to be intent on doing. Meanwhile, I simply tell him that the government quite understands that the Canadian north has been badly hurt by a fall in mineral and oil and gas prices of late, but there can be no doubt about this government's commitment and determination to preserve and enhance Canadian sovereignty in that area.

With regard to the construction of the Class 8 icebreaker, it is with Canadian sovereignty in mind that that is being done. Likewise, it is with Canadian sovereignty in mind that we are modernizing our northern defences.

Senator Lucier: Well, honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate again if he could perhaps explain it in such a way that people from the north—who obviously are not very bright, because we do not understand this!—could understand it. How can one icebreaker going through the north with a group of sailors from southern Canada represent our northern sovereignty when you have just taken a great number of the people from one particular community out of there? Were the military not indicating our sovereignty in the north? Isn't that how you show sovereignty in the north?

Senator Murray: I think it is pretty clear that, for whatever reason, the honourable senator does not understand, or does not choose to understand. In any case, I undertake that if he wishes to put down a notice of inquiry or if he wishes to debate the matter at the appropriate time, I, or one of my colleagues, will speak on behalf of the government.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I have one more comment. The Leader of the Government in the Senate seems to like this tack, namely, every time a question is asked that he cannot answer, suggesting that somebody should be debating it. I am asking a question on behalf of the people of Inuvik and the people of the Northwest Territories. They are very concerned about this. I would like to know why the government would be doing this type of thing. Why would they be removing all of what constitutes our northern presence at this particular time—especially when the rest of the economy up there has been devastated?

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY—THREATENED ACTION BY UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Is there any progress to report as yet with respect to the threatened action by the United States of America against the softwood lumber industry of Canada? Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate able to report any encouraging progress?

Senator Perrault: There was not any progress yesterday, either. We hope that at some point in time there will be progress.

TRADE—IMPOSITION OF TARIFF ON PUBLICATIONS—AMOUNT AND DISTRIBUTION OF REVENUE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: I have a related question, honourable senators. A few weeks ago, indeed, a few months ago an impost was placed on the importation of English-language books from the United States, Great Britain and other countries. Is the Leader of the Government able to tell us how much money has been captured by the government coffers so far from this so-called attempt to punish the United States? I would like to know the amount of money collected so far and how much of that amount has found its way back into specific aid programs to the shingle workers who have been affected by the discriminatory U.S. action against shakes and shingles.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the measure was not intended as a revenue-raising measure, but it was one of the few avenues open to us for retaliation in respect of the measures taken by the United States against shakes and shingles. We continue to believe that that measure will prove to have been effective.

Senator Perrault: I have some related questions. First, why is this measure only targeted against English-language literature coming in from the United States and other countries, and why are not books in other languages subject to the impost?

Second, the Leader of the Government has said that it is not a revenue-raising measure. Specifically, the Minister of Finance produced a figure, when the measure was first introduced in June of 1986, of the amount of money that he intended to raise as a result of this measure—money not from the United States but money from Canadians who are fed up with paying high costs for books at this Christmastime when thousands of books are being sold across the country.

Senator Murray: I think the question was asked some time ago and was answered—

Senator Perrault: It was not answered.

Senator Murray:—as to why it was limited to English-language books, but I shall get a fuller explanation for the honourable senator.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER EXPORT TAX—EXTENT OF APPLICATION

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to the one just asked by Senator Perrault on the question of the softwood lumber negotiations with the United States. Is it the policy of the government in those negotiations to agree that any export tax which may be put upon these exports of softwood lumber to the United States will also apply to exports to other countries and to other markets to which Canada exports such lumber?

Senator Perrault: It will be corrected.

Senator Austin: I would like to ask one further question on the subject. As it is believed in various forest industry circles that the American position is that any agreement must embody an export tax which would be universal, does this suggest to us that these negotiations are unlikely to be concluded and legislation is unlikely to be introduced with respect to an export tax before December 30?

Senator Murray: I do not think it will be safe for the honourable senator or for me to make those assumptions.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

GOVERNMENT FUNDING OF POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, in the Monday edition of the Globe and Mail there was a letter to the editor written by four Canadians who are studying microelectronics and computer design at Stanford University in California. I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate is familiar with or has read that letter.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am sorry, I am not.

Senator Marsden: I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he could, in general terms, then, respond to the concerns brought forward by these young Canadians? They say in their letter that they are deeply concerned because, having been educated at the expense of this country by having had four years of undergraduate training, four to six years of post-graduate support and a great deal of other research and education in Canada, it is their view that the government has failed to make a sufficient commitment to the funding of research and post-secondary education to enable them to return to Canada to engage in what they call "forming the backbone of Canada's future economic strength," that is, working in their own fields in research and development.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate comment on their concern and on what the government proposes to do to meet that concern?

Senator Murray: No, honourable senators, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to comment on the particular concerns expressed by the people who wrote a letter to the editor of the Globe and Mail beyond saying that the commitment of this government to increase research and development in this country in the private and public sectors and to post-secondary education remains very strong.

Senator Frith: As long as you don't have to put up the money.

SCIENTIFIC MEETING IN STOCKHOLM—CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Would the Leader of the Government tell us whether or not Canada has a representative at today's meeting on the Eureka Program in Stockholm which is, as he will know, a consortium of Europeans engaged in applied and basic research in this field. Are we represented at that meeting?

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

FOOTWEAR—REMOVAL OF IMPORT QUOTAS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

In the recent past the Conservative government has lowered the quotas on imported footwear. That decision was made on the premise that it would encourage the industry to become more competitive and would provide consumers with the benefit of lower-priced shoes. Indeed, the then Minister for International Trade, James Kelleher, is reported to have made the following statement:

... Canadian consumers have paid half a billion dollars more for shoes than they should have in the past eight years because of the import restrictions.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): What is the date of that report?

[Senator Marsden.]

Senator Bosa: November 22, 1985, shortly after he introduced that measure.

For the benefit of the Leader of the Government, I should like to quote some figures which are to be found in Statistics Canada Catalogue No. 65-007. It shows that in nine months in 1985-86 the importation of women's and girls' leather shoes has increased by 350 per cent. This is the import penetration of foreign shoes. I have a whole series of figures which range from 350 per cent to 129 per cent for slippers and house footwear; 108 per cent for children's and infants' leather footwear; and so forth.

In the same catalogue are to be found some other figures which indicate the import price movements. It shows, for instance, an increase in the price of men's boots and shoes of 12.5 per cent and an increase in children's and infants' boots and shoes of 26 per cent.

I do not want to bore the honourable senator by reading a whole slew of other statistics, but I would like to mention one more figure. This industry employed 15,000 people, but since the introduction of the relaxation of restrictions, there has been a reduction in a number of jobs by 1,500, or 10 per cent of the workforce.

In light of these dramatic statistics, is the Leader of the Government able to provide the Senate with information as to whether the government is going to reconsider its position in respect of this particular matter?

Senator Murray: Those are certainly very interesting statistics, honourable senators.

I think the best course for me would be to ask the appropriate department to furnish a commentary on those statistics which I will be glad to present to the Senate as soon as it has been prepared.

AGRICULTURE

WHEAT—EFFECT OF DEFICIENCY PAYMENT ON TWO-PRICE SYSTEM

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

All of us were delighted with the government's announcement that deficiency payments will be made to farmers, and the farmers, I do not have to tell you, of Saskatchewan and the prairie provinces were perhaps more delighted than anyone that at least something was being done to alleviate the serious financial crisis which is facing agriculture in that part of the world.

My question relates to the matter of a two-price system for wheat. Perhaps I may preface it by saying that although the so-called deficiency payment, which is substantial, is a welcome stopgap measure, it really is not a long-term solution by any means.

Some months ago in this chamber we asked about the possibility of the government improving the price which is paid to farmers for domestic grain, raising it to a figure of perhaps

$10 a bushel. At that time, I believe, we were assured that the matter was under serious consideration.

It may be argued that the government took the other direction by moving into deficiency payments and, again, no one is complaining; but the deficiency payment is really not enough, nor is it a major solution to the problem. A more permanent method of assistance would be to increase the domestic price paid to farmers.

My question is: Is this matter under serious consideration at the present time or has it been dropped, in light of the other announcement of deficiency payments?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the matter has not been dropped; it is still under consideration, but we do not contemplate any immediate decision of the kind suggested by the honourable senator.

Senator Buckwold: I take that response as being a message to the effect that there is no great urgency on the part of the government to consider the financial plight of our farmer friends. I should like to suggest that it is a matter of urgency and it cannot be put on a back burner and casually referred to as something which will be considered in due course.

I would hope the message might get through to the appropriate minister that this could be a significant addition to assistance given to farmers who need it so much.

Senator Murray: My honourable friend will be aware of the fact that such benefits as would accrue from that decision would accrue to those farmers whose wheat was marketed domestically. He will also be aware that in addition to the undoubted benefits which would accrue to those people, there are also other factors that would adversely affect other people in industry in the country. All these matters have to be weighed very carefully when considering this matter.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Supplementary to that question, I would hope the Leader of the Government would think of the bakery industry and its large number of employees when considering the matter raised by the honourable senator.

Senator Murray: That was if not uppermost in my mind at least in the back of my mind when I answered the supplementary question of Senator Buckwold.

AIR CANADA

WINNIPEG, MANITOBA—REDUCTION IN OPERATIONS— GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question to the leader of the government regards Air Canada, and particularly Air Canada's operations in western Canada.

As the minister no doubt is aware, when the company was originally established, then known as Trans-Canada Airlines, the headquarters were in Winnipeg and most of the company's activity took place there. Over the years there has been a constant erosion of that situation, generally in favour of Dorval and Montreal.

Some two years ago a decision was made by Air Canada to build a major computer centre in Winnipeg. Now we understand that Air Canada proposes to sell the building.

My concern is: Is there also connected with this any erosion of any of the activities that Air Canada has been conducting in Winnipeg? Is this the beginning of another phase of moving things out of the area?

● (1500)

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FOREIGN SERVICE APPOINTMENTS—MAINTENANCE OF PROFESSIONALISM—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to raise a question based upon the matter of professionalism in the Foreign Service of Canada. With the recent appointment of former Mayor Drapeau to UNESCO in Paris, the present government will have appointed a total of 14 non-career persons to the Foreign Service of Canada—a move without precedent in the history of this country. Has the government abandoned the concept of maintaining the professional foreign service which has served Canada so well and which has been so highly commended to the government in the recent report of the joint committee?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the government has looked other than to the Department of External Affairs in 13 or 14 cases out of I do not know how many nominations. That that should be interpreted as meaning that the government has abandoned the concept of a professional diplomatic service is surely an exaggerated and alarmist point of view.

With regard to the employment of former Mayor Drapeau, I hope that the Honourable Leader of the Opposition would acknowledge that Mr. Jean Drapeau is, on the international scene—and deservedly so—one of the most renowned of present day Canadians.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have no intention of debating the capabilities of former Mayor Drapeau, for whom I have the greatest admiration. What I am concerned about is professionalism in the foreign service. No matter what the Leader of the Government may think, the Prime Minister, prior to the election, assured the Professional Association of Foreign Service Officers in Canada that he would continue the tradition of maintaining a professional foreign service; that is, the maintenance of a foreign service composed of persons who have spent their lives working in the field of international affairs. That is what professionalism means. Obviously, former Prime Ministers have taken a view totally different from that of the present Prime Minister, because in the first two years of his mandate he has appointed 14 non-career persons to the foreign service.

The Professional Association of Foreign Service Officers described this as patronage. I am not using that description, but I am concerned about the departure from the system followed by every former Prime Minister. In the 16 years of Mr. Trudeau's prime ministership, for example, 16 non-career persons were appointed to the foreign service, which amounts to one per year. In two years the present Prime Minister has made 14 such appointments. I could go on. In all the years that Mr. Diefenbaker was Prime Minister, he appointed two or three non-career persons; in the five years that Mr. Bennett was Prime Minister, he appointed two or three; Mr. St. Laurent likewise, Mr. Clark likewise.

I think that we are entitled to ask—and if it is the declared policy of the government we ought to know about it—is it now the intention of the government to fill diplomatic posts abroad through the appointment of persons outside the professional stream in our public service? If that is the intention, let us know about it. But to argue that it has not happened is, in my view, a travesty of the facts.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the fact remains that the preponderant, overwhelming majority of those who hold ambassadorial rank in this country are people who have grown up in the Foreign Service of Canada. We have brought to ambassadorial positions people such as Stephen Lewis, David MacDonald and others, who, I think, bring an important and different perspective to their jobs and who are an adornment to the public service and the foreign service of this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, it is a fact that in the career of every former Prime Minister, the preponderance of ambassadorial positions were filled by professional career diplomats and foreign service officers. None of them felt it was desirable to depart from that system in the outrageous way in which the present Prime Minister has, while at the same time asserting—I think hypocritically and falsely—to the professional foreign service officers that he is dedicated to filling these positions in a professional way. To argue that every appointment is that of a person with career and professional abilities in the foreign service is outrageous. That is not the case.

It is true that from time to time former Prime Ministers have found it necessary to select a number of individuals to serve in important diplomatic positions, and I think that that should be continued.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: The number is much higher than what you said for Mr. Trudeau. He made more than 14 appointments.

Senator MacEachen: He appointed 16 non-professional career persons—

Senator Flynn: I disagree.

Senator MacEachen: —to the diplomatic service in 16 years; one per year.

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator Flynn: No!

Senator MacEachen: If Senator Flynn wants a few more facts, I can provide them. In the many years that Mr. King was Prime Minister, he appointed 17 such non-career persons.

Senator Flynn: When he started, there was no Department of External Affairs.

Senator MacEachen: Canada received the power to appoint its own diplomats in 1926, and it is upon the time following that date that the statistics are based. Mr. King made 17 such appointments in all the years he was Prime Minister; Mr. Bennett was Prime Minister for five years and he made two such appointments; Mr. St. Laurent was Prime Minister for eight years and he made four such appointments.

Senator Flynn: I do not know where you got those figures, but—

Senator MacEachen: Well, I will tell you where I got them.

Senator Frith: Then you can find out where Senator Flynn got his.

Senator MacEachen: If Senator Flynn has opposing figures, then he had better produce them. Mr. Pearson, in the years he was Prime Minister, appointed four.

Senator Balfour: How many did Mr. Turner appoint?

Senator MacEachen: Mr. Turner appointed three, all of whom were rescinded by his gracious successor who, reviling the practice of patronage by rescinding these three appointments, then proceeded to make an unprecedented 14 appointments of non-professionals at the highest possible level.

I think all the facts impel me to ask the government whether it has abandoned the notion of a Canadian professional foreign service, that is all. If it has, tell us and we will debate that. But do not say that the government still believes in the professional foreign service while, at the same time, it appoints such noted diplomats as Dennis McDermott.

Senator Murray: I thought the name would come up. I was waiting for it.

Senator Frith: We wouldn't disappoint you, senator.

Senator Murray: Our ambassador in Dublin continues to rankle the Leader of the Opposition, and I know how much he admires Jean Drapeau.

Senator MacEachen: I could mention a couple of Tories who are equally outrageous.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, let me say once again that the vast, preponderant, overwhelming majority of the ambassadorial positions filled by this government have been filled from within the public service, from within the foreign service, and that we remain committed to doing that. We have, as I have said, appointed excellent people from outside the foreign service to important foreign posts, and I do not preclude the possibility that we will do that again when it is in the national interest to do so.

● (1510)

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government is on very weak ground, as he well knows. He is on very weak ground because all he can say is, "We intend to appoint, as has been done in the past, a majority of persons from the foreign service itself." We all know that. Every other Prime Minister was faced with the same reality and continued the practice of maintaining a professional foreign service. The present Prime Minister has abandoned that practice and has appointed an unprecedented number of persons who are not career diplomats, who are not professionals, and I just ask: Why does not the government tell us the policy which it is following and not speak out of two sides of its mouth—a practice which is becoming increasingly under attack throughout the country?

The Leader of the Government knows that his response is inadequate, but he continues making it. Like so many attitudes taken by the government, it is not a credible attitude. If it is your decision to change the composition of the foreign service, tell us that—that's all; but if it is not your intention, then why proceed to do it at all, let alone in such a totally misguided way?

TRANSPORT

PROHIBITION OF SMOKING ON COMMERCIAL FLIGHTS

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. The Minister of Transport some time ago made an announcement that he would bring in a regulation or a law to prevent smoking on commercial flights of less than two hours' duration. Can the Leader of the Government say when that will happen and how it will take place?

Senator Lucier: While the Leader of the Government is obtaining that information, in light of recent and ongoing reports of the serious effects of smoking in confined areas, particularly on non-smokers, would the Minister of Transport consider making a regulation or introducing a law extending the prohibition to people who board aircraft with small children? It seems criminal to me that one can board an airplane with a small child and walk through the smoking section and not be able to see the child because of the smoke.

Perhaps the Leader of the Government might ask the Minister of Transport at the same time that he is making a ruling that there should be no smoking on commercial aircraft on flights lasting less than two hours that he also consider prohibiting adults from bringing children into the smoking section of aircraft, particularly on long flights. A flight from Toronto to Vancouver may take five hours, and that is a long time to have a small child sitting in a smoke-filled environment.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will undertake to convey those representations to the minister.

ROYAL ASSENT

ALTERNATIVE PROCEDURE

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. The Rules Committee looked into the question of providing an alternative procedure for having Royal Assent, which everyone seemed to be in favour of, including a committee of the House of Commons. What has happened to that report? Is anything likely to happen or, like everything else that happens around here with respect to suggested reforms, will the powers that be forget about it and will nothing be done?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I must say that this is the first time that this matter has been brought to my attention officially since I heard Senator Le Moyne's maiden speech in this house, when he quite properly protested against any change of that kind.

Senator Godfrey: Does the fact that he quite properly protested against any change mean that you are against any change, although you have not studied the report of the Rules Committee or heard the arguments? Is it emotional or have you really thought this through?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I should have said that he protested quite eloquently against any change. So far as my position is concerned, I am certainly against any change for the sake of change.

Senator Godfrey: I have no objection to that; but from what you have said, I gather that you are not proposing to look into the matter—or will you look into the matter and give it some consideration?

Senator Murray: I will certainly look into the matter.

Senator Frith: And take all of your prejudices into the room with you!

Senator Godfrey: It has been done in other jurisdictions.

JUSTICE

CANADA COMMISSION OF INQUIRY ON WAR CRIMINALS— STATUS OF REPORT

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, on October 2 last the Leader of the Government, in reply to one of my questions, stated that the Deschênes Commission of inquiry into the possibility of Nazi war criminals residing in Canada was extended until the end of November. Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether the commission has already tabled its report?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, so far as I am aware, the answer to that question is no. It seems to me that the extension, at least in part, was to provide for the translation of the report. I gather that there was quite a queue of task forces, commissions, and so forth, bringing their reports to the translation people, and that it is for that reason that we have not seen the report earlier. I will look into the matter and see if I can advise the honourable senator of a specific date when that report will be tabled.

Senator Haidasz: As a supplementary, could the minister tell us whether there is any truth to reports in the press that the Deschênes Commission is considering giving a confidential report to the Minister of Justice?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have no way of confirming or otherwise that report.

Senator Haidasz: As a further supplementary, does the Leader of the Government consider it is proper, following a public inquiry, to withhold information from the public after holding such a prolonged inquiry on an important issue?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, with great respect, that is a hypothetical question.

THE ESTIMATES, 1986-87

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) TABLED

Leave having been given to revert to Presentation of Petitions:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to draw to your attention the fact that in the other place today supplementary estimates (B) were tabled covering the contribution to the Canadian grain producers for the 1986 crop year. The amount in supplementary estimates is $300 million.

In order to deal with this important program, I should like to table supplementary estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1987, Sessional Paper No. 332-162, and later I will present a motion to refer supplementary estimates (B) to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, may I advise the members of the committee that the committee will sit tomorrow at 11 a.m. to examine supplementary estimates (B).

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Ian Sinclair, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

[Senator Murray.]

THE ESTIMATES, 1986-87

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine the expenditures set out in the supplementary estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1987, tabled in the Senate on 17th December 1986.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have just a small point. I had thought that once we tabled estimates they were automatically referred to the National Finance Committee and that, therefore, we no longer needed a motion. Perhaps I am wrong. We can check on the matter and clear it up tomorrow.

● (1520)

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Hon. Finlay MacDonald, moved the third reading of Bill C-4, to amend the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved third reading of Bill C-20, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not think it is our pleasure. One is tempted at third reading to have the bill pass on division. However, under the circumstances, I do not think that that is appropriate. So, like Seneca in ancient Roman times, while we will not let all our blood drain in the bath, we will let $1,000 of it drain, and pass the bill.

Senator MacEachen: We will hold our noses.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Then, is it agreed, honourable senators, that we will pass this bill—with regrets?

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1986-87

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Balfour, for the second reading of Bill C-29, an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1987.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have nothing lengthy to add to what I said yesterday. The system we are using for our appropriation bills—that is, having the estimates referred to the National Finance Committee and awaiting a report from that committee before dealing with the bills—is satisfactory. I imposed a delay yesterday merely to give honourable senators an opportunity to read the report that was tabled yesterday and to read the chairman's comments about that report, including its highlights.

As I mentioned yesterday, the highlights are set out clearly. I do not know whether in closing the debate on second reading Senator Doody will be able to give me some information about the question I raised arising out of the second paragraph on page 2. That paragraph refers to the committee's satisfaction with certain questions put to officials of the Treasury Board and the absence of answers to some questions they had put. My second question was with regard to Appendix 1 and whether there were any major policy initiatives included in the highlights listed there. The highlights include the Indian and Inuit Affairs Program, two items on the Agrifoods Program, the Employment and Insurance Program, statutory payments of Labour Canada, the Immigration Program and payments to the Canadian Film Development Corporation. With regard to those payments, I wonder if the Deputy Leader can tell us whether they relate to making accessible additional funds to the television industry and, if so, whether it deals with the possibility of private channels being able to benefit from the Canadian Film Development Corporation funds.

The list goes on to include another native claims program, Supply and Services payments, non-budgetary expenditures in the Energy Program, expenditures in the Northern Affairs Program and non-budgetary payments to the Export Development Corporation. To me, most of those items do not appear to involve important policy changes but merely supplementary items. However, I would like to have on record whether that is so.

Apart from those requests and with the information involved therein, I believe that we should, as usual, grant the government the supply covered by these supplementary estimates.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I shall not delay the house long. I want to say a word about the vote under the Treasury Board for a contingency fund. Perhaps honourable senators have had an opportunity to look at the report of the National Finance Committee. The purpose of this vote, according to its wording, is:

to provide funding for increased salary costs arising out of negotiated and non-negotiated agreements and other payroll requirements not included in departmental Estimates and for urgent expenditures of a miscellaneous character which cannot be foreseen when Estimates are drawn up.

The committee asked the officials of the Treasury Board if they had statistics showing how the vote had been expended in the past as between the two categories: first, the payroll requirements, and, second, urgent expenditures of a miscellaneous character which could not be foreseen. They produced interesting statistics showing that over the last few years the amount required for salary adjustments, as shown on page 3 of our report, has declined very sharply, whereas the amount expended under this vote for unforeseen but urgent requirements has gone up. For example, in fiscal 1980-81 the amount expended was $213 million. The amount for fiscal 1985-86 is $531 million.

I am not disputing the validity of some of these expenditures of money unappropriated by Parliament for specific purposes. All I want to do is to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that over $.5 billion was spent in 1985-86 for purposes which did not have the prior approval of Parliament. That is a very considerable sum of money. If we look at supplementary estimates (A) for the current fiscal year, we see how some of this money was spent. What happens is that the money is expended under the contingency fund vote of the Treasury Board. Then, in due course, the government comes to Parliament and asks for an appropriation under the appropriate department. That department, in turn, reimburses the contingency fund. Some of these expenditures are entirely understandable. There is the vote of $1 million for the Rick Hansen Man in Motion Fund. There is an expenditure for the Fathers of Confederation Building Trust in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island. Those expenditures seem to me to be understandable.

However, if honourable senators look at the supplementary estimates (A) under the heading "Employment and Immigration", they will find that the sum of $20 million toward a total of $34.5 million was provided from the Treasury Board contingency fund vote to pay for grants to individuals, organizations and corporations to provide employment opportunities by assisting local entrepreneurial development. We also have another item under the same department in the amount of $2.5 million for grants for employment creation.

● (1530)

I am not contending, honourable senators, that these purposes are not good. What I am suggesting is that something is wrong when over $35 million is being expended on various grant programs for employment creation. The government should have anticipated these requirements and set up an appropriate program by asking Parliament in advance to have the money appropriated for the purpose. It seems to me that this is the kind of retroactive parliamentary authorization which ought not to be required for these kinds of massive expenditures in an area in which Parliament traditionally has been required to vote large sums of money. It is appropriate that the committee should draw this matter to the attention of the house.

There is another item in the report on which one cannot be quite as specific. I refer to the question of providing financial support in the case of commissions of inquiry.

Senator Frith: On which page is that?

Senator Stewart: This is on page 4 of the committee's report. It is the last paragraph under the heading "Commissions of Inquiry". I quote:

These Supplementary Estimates did not contain any reference to the costs of the Parker Commission. Treasury Board officials indicated that they anticipate such an item in the next supplementary estimates.

I assume that they mean the set after the ones which were brought in today. The report continues:

The Committee learned that with any inquiry under the Inquiries Act, there are virtually no expenditure guidelines. While standards which are approved by Treasury Board apply to such items as living and travel expenses, no such guidelines exist regarding other potentially expensive items such as the legal costs of witnesses and the length or extensiveness of an inquiry.

The committee then goes on to say that it is concerned about the open-endedness and lack of guidelines for such inquiries.

Another point which came up in the committee is not mentioned in the report; however, it is a point which deserves some attention. The costs of the Parker Commission are referred to here. As I understand it, the tradition has been that when a minister of the Crown is involved in litigation arising from the performance of the duties of his department, the Crown foots the bill. However, we now have a situation where a former minister is involved in expenses arising out of an alleged breach of conflict of interest guidelines. I anticipate that this is not the last time—perhaps not under this government but under future governments—that this kind of difficult situation will arise. It seems to me that persons accepting appointments as ministers of the Crown ought to be clearly advised what the ground rules are. For example, if in the future the situation arises in which a minister of the Crown or a former minister of the Crown is accused of having breached the guidelines, will that minister or former minister be obliged to come up with the money from his own pocket for his own representation, or will the Crown, in the future, be prepared to provide the money? I raise this in an entirely non-partisan manner, because it seems to me that it is perfectly proper that a person when accepting office should know what the obligations will be if, in fact, either inadvertently or advertently, he or she becomes involved in this kind of situation. This is a point which we might have covered in our report. It is certainly one which, in my opinion, deserves some attention.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Doody speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I would like to thank Senator Frith and Senator Stewart for their comments. First of all, with regard to the list of items that Senator Frith mentioned, there appears to be no major policy developments in any of these areas. It would seem to me that the committee was satisfied with the questioning on the Canadian Film Corporation and the Indian and Inuit vote, and so on. They seem to be merely extensions of present programs or policies.

With regard to the questions asked by members of the committee which had not been answered at the meeting but to which the Treasury Board agreed to furnish answers—and furnish them by the end of January 1987—there were six such questions. The first one Senator Stewart has just very ably elaborated on, and that is the breakdown and analysis of the extent to which Vote 5—the contingency fund—has been used for unforeseen salary adjustments and for unforeseen expenditures for the last five years. The Treasury Board has undertaken to give us a five-year breakdown in that area.

The second question is with regard to the Secretary of State—Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. Senator Simard asked whether the government takes into account the effectiveness and impact of research supported by the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council when examining requests for additional financing. His question also included the degree to which the remarks about this body by the Auditor General are considered before proposing any further budget increase.

The third question dealt with the Energy, Mines and Resources vote relating to New Grade Energy Inc. The chairman and Senator Stewart requested information about the organization of New Grade Energy Inc. as to who is on the board of directors and as to the purpose for which the $20 million will be used.

The fourth question dealt with the Department of Justice—courtroom facilities, Pictou County. Senator Stewart asked whether the grant for the construction of courtroom facilities in Pictou County, Nova Scotia, was an isolated incident or whether similar grants were made for courtroom facilities in other counties. He also asked whether there was a specific program for such expenditures for courtroom facilities.

The fifth question dealt with Regional Industrial Expansion and the grant to Baie Vert Mines Inc. Senator Stewart asked when and how Baie Vert Mines incurred the debt of $19 million to the Crown.

The sixth question related to the Department of Transport vote and passenger vessels. Senator Stewart asked why the $19 million to supplement the acquisition of three vessels was not anticipated and included in the main estimates. I think that pretty well covers the questions that were asked by Senator Frith. Of course, Senator Stewart's comments and guidelines on the minister's defence are well taken. This is a subject that deserves a great deal of attention.

With respect to the guidelines for inquiries, as Senator Stewart has indicated, there appear to be none for the most expensive part of it. I think we also neglected to mention that there were no suggested guidelines for professional fees. It is entirely up to the discretion of the chairman and his officials to decide what rates are to be paid for lawyers, accountants or whatever other professional people are required to attend. That, too, is an area that very likely needs some attention.

With these comments, honourable senators, I commend the supplementary estimates (A) to your care.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I wonder if the deputy leader would permit me to ask a question with respect to one additional matter?

Senator Doody: Very well.

Senator Frith: I would like to ask the deputy leader whether his study of the estimates that are part of the appropriation bill now before us, and of the report of the committee, satisfied him on the question of the $1 votes. You will remember that when he was the main critic on this side of the chamber, he was a proponent for a change in the approach to $1 votes. I want to be sure that he is satisfied that the system he then proposed and, to some extent, sponsored is now being properly observed?

Senator Doody: That just demonstrates once again how careful one must be in opposition. The answer to that question is yes, by and large, there have been remarkable improvements in the use of $1 votes. My memory—and I do not have the report with me—tells me that there is something like 24 $1 votes in that particular set of estimates. I think five of them were of a nature that required perhaps a little more attention than the Treasury Board would have liked, but, by and large, I still have grave reservations about dollar transfers and $1 votes. They are not used quite as extensively, and their use seems to vary; sometimes there are only one or two and suddenly they will jump up to a large number once again. But, by and large, I suspect that as long as we have Treasury Board officials and busy ministers we will have $1 votes; and as long as I am here I will keep complaining about them.

● (1540)

Senator Frith: And we should remain vigilant.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

MEMBERS OF NATIONAL CONGRESS OF ITALIAN CANADIANS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I ask leave to draw your attention to the spectators in the south gallery where the President, Executive and members of the National Congress of Italian Canadians are here as our guests. They will be hosting a reception tonight in the East Block for all parliamentarians;

I thought I should draw your attention to their presence in the south gallery and extend to them a hearty welcome on behalf of all senators.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Senator Bosa, would the word "bravo" be appropriate?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Bosa, how do we say welcome in Italian?

Senator Bosa: Benvenuti.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Benvenuti.

COASTAL FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by Honourable Senator Phillips, for the second reading of the Bill C-26, intituled: "An Act to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act".—(Hon. Senator Petten).

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I would like to congratulate our colleague, Senator Marshall, on his lucid explanation of the bill. I should say at the outset that we on this side of the chamber support Bill C-26.

Tougher penalties should deter illegal foreign fishing. Because of the opportunity of making as much as $60,000 per day, foreign vessels have been quite willing to run the risk of possible apprehension. However, increasing fines is only a first step in addressing the growing number of violations. Foreign overfishing threatens the lifeblood of many fishing communities. A more concentrated approach to the conservation and protection of fish stocks is required.

So, while this legislation increases the fines, the measures the minister has announced, that of providing full observer coverage on all licensed foreign vessels fishing in Canadian waters, arming DFO Atlantic offshore patrol vessels and boarding parties, exploring the DND and MOT means of increasing dedicated air and sea surveillance, acquiring one dual-engine helicopter for sea patrols—one is not very good; I would like to see more, but at least one is a start—and developing an electronic fishing licence that will facilitate identification of licensed fishing vessels, should be implemented.

The government should proceed quickly to implement these measures and put teeth into this legislation. As the bill has been pre-studied by the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries, I see no need to send it back to the committee and I would recommend to my colleagues the passing of this bill.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I had intended to say a few words on Bill C-32, but looking at the subject matter I felt that anyone reading Hansard would wonder why I was speaking on one subject under a completely different heading. For that reason, may I say a few words about the Coastal Protection Fisheries Act?

I would like to point out that this is a very powerful piece of legislation. Although I agree that the fines should be increased because, in fact, serious violations can take place over a very short period of time, I suggest that perhaps the government could consider using the act again as it was used in 1975. Honourable senators may remember that that was a period when the international organization called ICNAF, which was an organization without very much teeth, could not stop the excessive fishing by foreign nations. Particularly the Soviet Union was accused by Canada in these meetings of ICNAF of overfishing. They did not pay very much attention until one day, probably as a new minister not knowing the implications of it, I used the authority of the act to close the eastern ports to the Russian fleet. This was useful because it got their attention. From then on we solved a good number of issues in our bilateral dealings with them.

I see from the debates in the other place that there has been a considerable amount of irritation with the fact that the United States is fishing parts of the areas outside the 200-mile zone and that, in fact, they have not joined a new organization called NAFO, the North Atlantic Fisheries Organization—

Senator Frith: Who hasn't?

Senator LeBlanc: The United States. I might suggest that this government, if it is looking for a way to get the attention of Washington, might want to close some ports to the American fleet. It might also solve some of External Affairs' problems in relation to submarines in Canadian waters.

Coming back to more serious matters, although I agree with the increase of the fines, I am surprised that the debate did not touch very much on the question of cancelling licences or refusing licences to those nations that do not behave reasonably. There is no reason why we should renew licences for access to the Canadian zone to persistent violators. I see no reference to that in the bill—perhaps it is covered under another item.

On the question of using electronic and high tech equipment with a combination of satellite passages, it seems to me that this is a good use of high technology. I know that the department, when I was in it, did look at this possibility. I think it might be a very good way to reduce the costs of patrolling to find out if fishing vessels are present.

• (1550)

Honourable senators, I am slightly worried about the tone of the debate concerning surveillance and patrolling in relation to research effort. I have always thought that there was a difficult balance to maintain between how much policing you have in the fishing zone versus how much research you have. In other words, you can have more policing in a city, but you might sacrifice medical services. Surely a mistake in the assessment of fishing stocks by scientists can lead to much more serious repercussions than one vessel sneaking in and catching a few hundred tonnes of fish.

[Senator LeBlanc.]

I would suggest that the debate on whether Canada should or should not extend its jurisdiction beyond the 200-mile limit—what is called the "Nose and the Tail" of the Banks—is one which is important and difficult. But I hope that it does not become an excuse for our other fisheries problems.

Some ten years ago at the end of 1976 when we declared a 200-mile limit, I asked myself if we had not lost an excuse for dealing with a whole series of problems that had nothing to do with the extension of jurisdiction.

I recognize that the issue of fishing outside the 200-mile zone on the Banks is a difficult one, but I hope that it does not become an excuse for failing to consider a whole lot of other difficulties and problems which have not been dealt with by the industry which enjoys some prosperity because of very good export markets.

I suggest that problems such as consistency of quality and the organized marketing effort for Canadian fish are issues which are still with us. They were with us when we extended the zone to 200 miles and they are with us now. My worry is that they will still haunt us when our dollar returns to parity.

Honourable senators, that concludes the remarks I should like to make at this time. Of course, I will have a few words to say when Bill C-32 is debated later this afternoon.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, yesterday, in a general way, I suggested that it would be helpful if Senator Marshall, the sponsor of this bill, were to deal with the question of the special licence or permit given to a Japanese boat or organization to catch tuna off the coast of Nova Scotia. In conversations with the senator I agreed to be more specific as to the kind of information I think would be helpful.

First, I think it would be helpful to know under what authority the minister made his decision and what normal requirements were waived by his decision.

Second, where were the Japanese permitted to catch these tuna? Was it within the 200-mile zone or was it, indeed, within the 12-mile territorial sea?

Third, were the Japanese restricted to the same type of craft and gear as that used by Canadian fishermen?

Fourth, to whom are payments to be made by the Japanese and how is the amount of payment to be calculated?

Fifth, who first proposed this Japanese arrangement to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans?

Sixth, was the minister's decision in accordance with the advice of (a) his departmental officials and (b) the blue-fin advisory committee?

Finally, what new arguments were adduced which convinced the minister to make the decision he eventually did make?

I ask that last question because the Premier of the province of Nova Scotia has acknowledged, almost boasted, that he was influential in helping the minister to come to the right decision. I ask the senator what arguments were adduced by the Premier of Nova Scotia, or any other person, to convince the minister to come to the decision that he reached.

Honourable senators, as I said yesterday, this matter needs to be dealt with seriously, because east coast fishermen, even at the best of times, tend to be sensitive people, particularly where access to fishing stocks is concerned. They do not like to feel—perhaps they are all too ready to feel—that they are not being given a fair deal. There is no question but that in this situation they feel they have been very badly put upon.

Any information the senator can give us, either at this stage or at the third reading stage, would be beneficial. This is the kind of situation in which clarification and information may go a long way to remove uneasiness, discontent and a lack of confidence in the minister and the department.

I believe Senator Marshall agrees with me and will make a real effort to satisfy my questions.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Marshall speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Marshall: —at the outset, I commend Senator Petten for his short and succinct speech which covered what I took much longer to explain. He has been a valued member of the Fisheries Committee and I appreciate the recognition that he has given to the importance of this bill.

It is always good to have the participation of Senator LeBlanc who is still respected across the country as a former Minister of Fisheries. The contribution he made to the fishing industry in Canada was often mentioned during the committee's visit to British Columbia and the Yukon.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Marshall: He always raises points which others do not think of. I particularly like his idea about closing ports to Americans if they continue to create problems on the Georges Bank, what he calls the "Nose and the Tail." I will pass his ideas on to the minister and they may provide a solution if the fines are not having the desired deterrent effect.

Certainly, the minister has gone far enough to put teeth in the bill and we hope it will eliminate many of the violations such as have occurred in the past.

Mention was made of electronic equipment. During our pre-study of the bill, we had a complete explanation of the devices which are being considered or are now in operation. It seems to me that with the addition of 100 observers and a helicopter, which is now in the negotiation stage, we will see better surveillance and better protection of our fisheries.

Honourable senators, Senator Stewart was good enough to give me notice of many of the questions he has raised regarding the tuna situation. DFO has come up with some answers which I will read, and I hope I will be forgiven if the answers are not in the same order as the questions which he asked a few moments ago.

The senator asked whether the Japanese were permitted to catch the tuna within the 200-mile zone or the 12-mile limit. The answer is that the Japanese fishery was permitted within the 200-mile zone and the conditions of the Japanese licence prohibited fishing within the 12-mile limit and restricted fishing to NAFO divisions, 4VWX along the northeast coast of Nova Scotia and northerly of Browns Bank and in division 3NO. I meant to bring with me the map on which I marked those zones, but I can provide him with that map.

● (1600)

He asked as to whether the Japanese were restricted by the same type of craft and gear regulations as those restricting Canadian fishermen. The answer is no, the Japanese are using a much larger vessel with freezing capacity. A similar type of vessel does not currently exist in Atlantic Canada. The Japanese are using pelagic longlines with multiple hooks. Canadian fishermen are restricted to the use of angling gear or two-tended lines with no more than one hook attached to each line.

His next question was: Are there fish size requirements? The answer is that there are no specified size requirements. The quota stipulation on the fishing licence was that they were to catch 401 blue-fin tuna or 127,252.5 kilograms, whichever is reached first. This provided a built-in incentive to fish larger sized tuna, since the catching of small sized tuna would leave reduced the quota tonnage and thus the profit of this operation. The average weight per tuna caught by the Japanese operators, 97.5 kilograms, was far above the minimum permissible weight, which is 6.4 kilograms, under the regulations of the International Commission for the Conservation of Atlantic Tuna, or ICCAT.

His next question was: Under what provision did the minister allow the Japanese to fish? The answer is that the Japanese were authorized to fish under a licence issued in accordance with the Coastal Fisheries Protection Regulations made pursuant to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act.

He also asked whether the minister acted in accordance with the advice of, first, his departmental officials and, second, his advisory committee. With respect to the advice of departmental officials, this advice is provided on a confidential basis and ministers are free to accept, reject or modify it. What is relevant is the decision which the minister takes. In this case the minister's decision to proceed with the charter was based on the fact that the arrangement would allow Canadians to gain experience in a new technology. The minister's decision was not inconsistent with the advice of the Atlantic Regional Council.

The next question was: To whom were payments to be made by the Japanese? The answer is that the Japanese and the company agreed that 60 per cent of the payment would go to the 27 fishermen and that 40 per cent of the payment would go to the company.

Senator Stewart: What is the name of the company to which the honourable senator refers? My question, honourable senators, if I may, is: Were the Japanese transmitting payment to a particular company? If so, what company? Did the company then make a payment to the 27 private fishermen? In other words, was there a deal struck between the government, the Japanese and a particular company, a deal which was, in effect, blessed by the Minister of Fisheries?

Senator Marshall: I see that the name of the company is the Bayshore Tuna Fisheries Limited. I believe that general agreement has not been reached over the distribution and I think that it is still under negotiation. As to the distribution of payment, perhaps this will clarify the matter. On the calculation of the payment, the Japanese and the company agreed to $1 per pound for the tuna caught. It appears, then, that the fishermen were to get six times the 400,000.

Senator Stewart: That amount, less what the company kept for itself.

Senator Marshall: Yes. I believe I have answered all of the questions, unless the honourable senator has another.

Senator Stewart: I did have another question. What Senator Marshall has said suggests that there is some uncertainty as to whether the minister acted in accordance with the advice of his departmental officials. It seems to be generally known that he did not act in accordance with this advice, at least with their initial advice. On Monday I heard one of them on the radio saying that he was not particularly offended that his advice had not been taken. It is well known that the minister made this decision contrary to, at least, the initial advice of his officials; indeed, the Premier of Nova Scotia has implied that he had to intervene.

My question on that point was: What new considerations were adduced by the Premier of Nova Scotia which led the minister to make his decision? Was it the argument that they were going to learn some new technology, new methods of longlining? I would have thought that that was a technique in which east coast Canadian fishermen were already pretty highly experienced.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I would prefer to take the question as notice and I can probably provide an answer tomorrow.

That is all of the information I have today, honourable senators, and I move second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Marshall, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, for the second reading of the Bill C-31, An Act to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.—(Honourable Senator Argue, P.C.)

[Senator Stewart.]

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, yesterday I made some remarks on this bill following the very lucid explanation given by Senator Phillips. He is one of the farmers from Prince Edward Island, which is an important agricultural area, and he takes a great interest in agriculture. I am sure that his remarks are well worth noting. Very often we can learn from one another.

The measure before us today, as I understand it, and I think it is clear from the government's attitude, is really the beginning of the end of the Farm Improvement Loans Act. The bill extends that act for only a further six months.

I think the most important question we must ask ourselves is whether this is a wise move. I realize that it is a move by Mr. Wise, but is it a wise move by Wise? I doubt that it is. This act has been in effect for a very long time. I can attest to that because I came to Parliament Hill in 1945 and that was the year in which this act became operative.

Over the years, this act has been a very useful instrument to the agricultural producers of this country. It has provided a means by which the government could work with the banking institutions of this country. Its basic message to the banks was that if they lent to the farmers money for operational purposes and later for the purchase of land, the Government of Canada would provide a guarantee against loss up to what I believe was 10 per cent of the aggregate of the loan.

It has been a popular and useful measure over the years. I believe it is the experience of everyone, and the record shows, that the act has been highly successful in that farmers have had access to modest amounts of credit at relatively low interest rates—I think the word “relatively” is important—and the loss record has been highly acceptable and, I believe, very encouraging for this kind of operation. For many of the early years of the operation of the act the losses were in the neighbourhood of one tenth of 1 per cent. Since 1981 those losses have been increasing, and I read recently that the losses had gone up to one half of 1 per cent. Some people are speculating that if the farm economy continues to be as bad as it is now, then those losses may reach 1 per cent. But I would say that 1 per cent of the aggregate amount of the loan is still a pretty small amount. If you take a loan that might go over a period of ten years—that is the limit on some of them—it would be a very small part of the aggregate amount that would have to be paid out of the Canadian treasury to meet the losses.

So why is this act being discontinued? I believe that to be a fair interpretation of the measure now before us. I consider that it is an abandonment of the government's responsibility to so order the monetary and financial affairs of this country that farmers will have access to reasonable credit at reasonable rates of interest. It seems to me that in a very real way the government is capitulating to the pressure of the banks—and it has been a pressure that has been exercised not just in the last two years—to get for themselves larger and larger profits. The banks have been downgrading this system. They have been successful in getting away from this system—some chartered banks more than others. The worst offender, from my point of view—but it might not be the point of view of a person on the government side—is the Royal Bank. The best operator is the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce which has made six times as many loans under this act as has the Royal Bank.

What is the conventional position of the banking system when a farmer applies for a loan? The banker says, "You look okay to me. I think it is a good loan; but it will have to be prime plus 2," or in some cases it is prime plus 3. But the banks are not following the government system of guarantees. So what has this done? This has really sucked in a great many farmers to pay very high interest rates—and lest anyone think that it is the small, inefficient or the short-sighted farmer who has got himself or herself into this kind of trouble, from my reading of the situation out west it is the technologically informed, those with the highest educational level, those people in the farming community who are most aggressive, who are the ones who decided that credit was there to lever their operations so that they could do better, be more efficient and make more money. They are the people who went to the banks; and the banks unloaded a lot of credit.

Now farmers are in great difficulty. The banks are foreclosing and they, too, are in a dilemma. Banks are in a dilemma in Saskatchewan. If they take the land from the farmers, which they are now doing, provincial law says that they can hold it for only two years. So they have to put it on the market—and the price of land is collapsing. It has been reduced by 50 per cent in the past three or four years, and it may be reduced another 50 per cent in the next two years. It goes down and down and down; and as the value of land goes down, more and more farmers lose all of their equity and are subject to foreclosure, and more and more land is put on the market. So it becomes a real catastrophe.

In Saskatchewan the banks have only two years to get that land on the market, and so they put it there—and I believe that to be roughly the case in Manitoba and Alberta, where there are laws which prevent outside corporations and financial institutions owning large acreages of land.

That has been the trend. There was a fairly comprehensive debate in the House of Commons. Moe Foster, the Liberal critic, does a highly commendable, excellent, job in his position as critic for the Official Opposition. Moe Foster is a veterinarian from Ontario and has become an expert as an agriculture critic. He understands the farm situation—the western situation as well as the eastern situation.

I was absolutely amazed when looking at Hansard of the House of Commons for yesterday to learn that while a very large delegation from the Western Wheat Growers Association was sitting in the gallery—the delegation is in Ottawa to ask the government to take action so that farmers can receive the final payment that is coming to them by right, and by the market return, for No. 1 and No. 2 wheat—Moe Foster was the only opposition member to raise the subject.

The NDP today have bigger fish to fry. They overlooked the wheat producers on the prairies.

Senator Frith: And they are catching a few.

Senator Argue: They are catching a few. I do not know how they will turn out. When someone comes along unsolicited and crosses party lines, you never know how it will turn out.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Argue: That is exactly why I said it.

Senator Frith: We are happy.

Senator Argue: Anyway, they are dreaming about other places and other regions. The predecessor of the present New Democratic Party was a real voice for agriculture. Here was a substantial delegation, representing virtually all of the wheat producers—not because they have the membership but because the subject was a correct one and has support—and the NDP was in a non-functioning role.

However, I should get on. Mr. Foster, in dealing with this subject, says on page 2097 of House of Commons Debates for Monday, December 15:

However, I think what is more important today is whether the Government is prepared to encourage the banks to make more money available. Will he . . .

He is referring to Agriculture Minister Wise:

. . . call in the respective bank presidents and say we would like to see a certain percentage of the relevant loans made available under this Act?

Not a very revolutionary suggestion. He was not asking them to take over the banks. He did not ask them to bring a section of the banks under federal government ownership—as we have a section of the oil industry and a lot of other industries—but just to call in the presidents, have a nice little visit with them and see if they will do a little more under this act. The Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable John Wise, replied:

Mr. Chairman, if the Hon. Member thinks this Parliament can legislate that, then he is whistling in the dark. It is a fairyland type of approach.

He wasn't asked to legislate; just to call in the presidents. The presidents should have been called in long ago, and they should be called in now. I believe that this act is a good one and necessary for the future—probably even more so than it has been for the past.

No doubt tomorrow we will be dealing with the government's vote for deficiency payments. The deficiency payments, while welcome to the extent that they are there, really are not going to touch the basic problem. The sum of $840 million is being allocated to western farmers. There are 140,000 permit book holders. So I guess that would average out to $6,000 per permit book holder. There is a ceiling of $25,000 above which no farmer can be paid. We all know how averages work. The few who are at the top of the income scale obviously have greater weight in setting the averages, so the great bulk of farmers will get something like $5,000 in total each. That works out to a first payment of maybe $1,700 or $1,800 for the current fiscal year, and it will double to $3,400 or $3,500 in the next fiscal year. That money will not go very far to solve the financial problems of western Canada.

I had a farm leader—I shall call him a farm leader because he has the support of farmers in his district; he is one of their leaders and he is up for election periodically—phone me last night. He said, “Mr. Argue, I have five quarter-sections of land, I have a $60,000 land mortgage, I have a $50,000 operating loan at the bank, I have a $110,000 debt against my five quarters of land which a few years ago were worth $40,000. Now the bank is pressing me and I am fairly pessimistic. Obviously, I want to be hopeful, but it looks like I am going to lose my farm to the bank.” Because there is no protection, farms will be lost by the thousands upon thousands unless some action is taken. There are some review panels, but they have no clout. There is such a panel in Saskatchewan. I think these panels provide a way to ease the farmer—it really does not ease him, but emotionally and psychologically they try to help ease him out of his financial problem by saying, “Look, we don’t see any hope for you. Your debts are too high. The best thing is to sign off and avoid any further legal costs and further piling up of debt through interest rates. Throw in the sponge.”

What we need in the agricultural industry today are programs like the Farm Improvement Loans Act, which limit interest rates to prime plus 1. There are people in this chamber who know better than I exactly what that means, but I guess it represents something over 10 per cent today. The Premier of Saskatchewan brought in a limited program to reduce certain interest rates for farm loans to 6 per cent. If we had a program that provided a small subsidy on interest rates, that, say, brought them down to 6 or 7 per cent on an amount that enabled the farmer to retain his five or six quarters of land, that extended the payment period over a substantial time, and that perhaps said to creditors, “We will still include for some of the debt a nominal obligation without interest so that if there is a big turn around in the farming community, part of that additional debit will be paid,” the farmer might have a chance to keep his land. In my judgment, such a program would come to this nation with a lower financial cost than that resulting from the way we are proceeding now, a way that is opposite to this bill—high interest rates, heavy debts, foreclosures and a process of putting land on the market when there are no buyers.

I have been told by two people—and I admit that it is only two people—in western Canada—one in Manitoba and one in Saskatchewan—that in their areas some farmers have their land for rent and nobody will pick it up. That land may remain idle in 1987 simply because nobody thinks that they can operate the land and make any money off it. We are in a very difficult situation. I think it goes beyond partisan politics. I think that a lot of thought should be given to this problem. There are ways out. The banks could lend money at a reasonable rate with a guarantee. With a guarantee from the government they will not lose anything. All the government says is, “Operate at a modest profit.” The banks say, “No, we want exorbitant profits.” It seems that many large creditors can get money at prime plus 1. Surely if the Government of Canada guarantees the banks prime plus 1 on loans to farmers, such a program should provide farmers with some money.

The Honourable Erik Nielsen headed a task force that investigated many of these expenditures. The report contains some useful information. For example, in 1966, 44 per cent of the agricultural lending portfolios of the banks of this country was made up of guaranteed loans under the Agricultural Farm Improvement Loans Act. Today the percentage is down to 6.4 per cent. That tells the story. The Nielsen report says in its conclusion:

The study team recommends to the Task Force that the government consider allowing the program to expire and transferring the administration of the claims payments to Farm Credit Corporation.

I am pleased to support this bill because it keeps this act alive for another six months. I hope those who are studying the agriculture credit situation in Canada will try to bring some new thinking to the problem of bringing down interest rates, and to give farmers an obligation that they can handle, and try to take extraordinary steps to maintain a reasonable market value for land so that the equity of farmers, whether they have clear title or whether they are heavily in debt, is not allowed to deteriorate any further.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Phillips speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Argue for his participation in the debate and rise to assure him that the government has not decided to discontinue the Farm Improvement Loans Act. If the honourable senator had read thoroughly the House of Commons Hansard he was referring to, he would have seen that the minister said that such was the case. I was almost tempted to remind Senator Argue that he forgot to read some very interesting parts of the House of Commons Debates and the Debates of the Senate. I thought he would have referred to the minister’s remarks on what the increased interest rate did to the farm economy, or to the fact that this government has, in just two years, placed $5.8 billion in various farm programs.

Senator Argue: That is stretching it pretty far, Orville.

Senator Phillips: And that does not include the $1 billion for the grain farmers.

Senator Argue: Most of that money had to be paid out because the law required it. You could not break the law even if you wanted to.

Senator Phillips: I thought that I would make the record more precise with those remarks.

Senator Frith: Nice try.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Phillips, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Robertson, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the second reading of the Bill C-32, intituled: "An Act to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act."—(Honourable Senator LeBlanc) (Beauséjour).

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I am trying to establish a record by speaking twice in the same day.

Senator Marshall: It does not happen very often.

Senator LeBlanc: We support the extension of the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act for a six-month period. I am tempted to ask the question that I should have asked when I was sponsoring this very same legislation, namely, why are we doing it for six months and not for two years? Someone suggested that perhaps the Department of Finance was trying to reform it, or amend it, or change it. Of course, that department is involved in other things. If I could borrow from Mr. Diefenbaker's famous quote, "When the Department of Finance is chasing a moose, they do not get distracted by rabbits." I do not know if this is seen as rabbit legislation.

The fact is, however, I would like to put one question—and I will wait until third reading to get the answer. When a fisherman goes to his banker, is the licence used as collateral? In other words, are the banks assuming that they can take a fisherman's licence and his boat, et cetera, as collateral? I think it would be an interesting fact to ascertain, if we could, at third reading.

On the general issue of why we only do it for six months, I will leave that for the next time we renew it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I want to say that I used to ask that question in this house when my colleague who just spoke was the minister. At that time it used to be done yearly. I thought it was bad enough that we had to do the same thing every year; now it seems to me that it will be every six months unless, as Senator Argue has pointed out, the government is winding down this legislation. However, as far as the east coast is concerned, I am not sure that it would make that much difference.

I do, however, want to point this out. I have been in this house for a number of years and I cannot help but sit back and enjoy and listen to the representatives from western Canada from either side of the house when they speak about farming and agriculture. I sometimes envy them, and sometimes I make up my mind that I will speak long and loud every time there is anything to be said about fisheries in the hope that maybe, at long last, we may get some recognition. To make my point once more, honourable senators, I want to say this: If you look at the previous bill regarding the Farm Improvement Loans Act, you will notice that the written figure is one billion, five hundred and fifty million dollars. Senator Argue—and I suppose rightfully so—says it is not enough; it should be more. I am not for one moment going to pretend that fisheries is as important an industry to this country as agriculture, but I can say that the export from fisheries has passed the billion dollar mark; a large number of people on the east coast and on the west coast—I have just returned with my colleagues from the west coast where we were looking at the fisheries situation in that part of the country—could use some assistance. But you look at this pittance, $30 million in 1986, when the budget of Canada is over the hundred billion dollar mark. We waste the time of Parliament, which asks us to renew the guarantees and come to the assistance of fishermen with a pittance of $30 million.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Robertson speaks now, her speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, before Senator Robertson closes the debate, I wonder if I might say a few words regarding one of the aspects of fishing that has been overlooked in the past by the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. I realize it is not nearly as big a problem as it is on the coast, but the inland fishery does require some different treatment, because a good deal of the inland fishery—and Senator Marshall's committee commented on this and received a number of representations to this effect during our tour—is done in the winter. The equipment required for that activity is snowmobiles and specialized equipment of that sort, which has not been covered in the past by the provisions of the legislation which deals with boats.

That particular fishery is important to the native people of this country. A good deal of it is done by native fishermen in northern Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and part of it is done in the Yukon. There ought to be provisions in the legislation to permit those who have this specialized kind of fishing to obtain the same sort of assistance for equipment as is provided to those who need boats for their fishing activities.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators, I appreciate the interventions on the part of Senator LeBlanc, who has such knowledge of this particular area, my old friend, Senator Thériault and Senator Molgat. I know that your interventions are serious interventions and that you have a great concern for the fisheries.

The figure that Senator Thériault mentioned as being such a pittance is when you refer and relate it to the figure received by the agriculture industry.

If I might go back—you will notice this in Hansard—I was quite shocked to notice that since the inception of the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act in December of 1955, the act has guaranteed loans totalling only $246 million. In all, that is not very much money; it really isn't if you look over that period of time, considering the fact that the livelihood of so many fishermen depends on the continuing support of governments.

I come to a comment by our present minister—and it may help to answer Senator LeBlanc's query regarding why this bill is established for six months, et cetera. I am somewhat encouraged when I see the response of our minister in the other place when he tells the other house that he wants this time because he wants to look at other ways for improving the provision of preferential financing for the fishermen. I believe that that is a sincere comment on his part and that this short interlude of additional assessment will give the department and the government an opportunity to look at ways to improve the way in which we manage the credit services for our fishermen. God knows, we have to have an improvement in this. We know that the repayment rate has been very good. I believe the last figure for default I looked at here was only 5.5 per cent, which was pretty good. Certainly that is not an aspect that has to be terribly offensive to anyone. However, I would be optimistic, and I am certain all members of this chamber would be optimistic, that in the six-month period that we are making available to the minister, to his department, and to the government, that they will be able to come up with improvements for the financial support of our fishermen on both coasts and in the freshwater fishery, as identified by Senator Molgat. Although the committee chaired by Senator Marshall dealt with the items mentioned by Senator LeBlanc, which are improved quality, improved marketing and diversification of species for consumption, all of which have been haunting us for some time now, when we were listening to the witnesses, we heard all of their other problems and it was only proper and just that we listen to those as they were presented to us.

• (1640)

Honourable senators, there are many problems, and I wish the minister and his staff well in the next few months as they try to come up with improved financial support for our fishermen, because they certainly need it.

Honourable senators, with those few comments, I conclude my remarks on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, would the sponsor of the bill permit a question?

Senator Robertson: Certainly.

Senator Thériault: Is the sponsor of the bill prepared now to tell us what the minister has in mind in order to replace the present legislation?

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators, I will attempt to get the information Senator LeBlanc asked for regarding licensing. I have not yet put that question to the minister.

Honourable senators, although I cannot be specific, it is my understanding that the minister is considering different models. From my understanding of my conversations with the department, I believe they are having some problems with the banks. It is too soon to give specifics of the models. If the honourable senator has any recommendations, I would be glad to pass them on to the minister.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Robertson, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Duff Roblin moved the second reading of Bill C-14, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words of introduction to this piece of legislation which is called Bill C-14, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

It is fortunate, I think, that the bill received a pre-study by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on November 5. At that time representatives of the department dealt with some of the questions which arose. Nevertheless, since this is the official occasion on which this bill is introduced in the chamber, I think it incumbent upon me to give a brief review of the facts.

While its title refers to excise tax—and perhaps sales tax is included in that phrase—it includes a good deal more than that. It includes some items of tax relief and tax adjustment, as well as tax imposition, which all have their important aspects.

The bill arises from the February 1986 budget and cognate matters in connection with that which the Department of Finance thought fit to legislate upon. It covers, among other things, an increase in the revenue of the treasury. In fact, I think it is probably fair to say that the main impact of this bill is to increase taxation in order to help the government deal with the questions of the deficit in the budget and to provide some of the funds, at least in a theoretical way, for some of the other measures that were discussed this afternoon, because the money always has to come from someplace and it is always painful, at least I found it to be the case, to have to impose or to recommend legislation that increases taxes. But, I would suggest, it is inevitable.

The main revenue increases in this piece of legislation call for an increase in the federal sales tax of 1 per cent. This is, of course, added to the tax rates now in effect and means that the tax on construction materials and cable TV will now be 8 per cent. Alcohol and tobacco will go to 15 per cent and other taxable items will be now taxed at 12 per cent. This, of course, will raise a substantial sum of money, well over $1 billion in one particular fiscal year.

In addition to the sales tax increases, there are excise tax increases on alcohol and tobacco. Formerly, the excise tax in many respects was an ad valorem tax so it increased automatically when the price of the goods concerned rose, but, I think advisedly, we have dispensed with the ad valorem system and now we have to raise the tax deliberately if we wish to have the same effect. That is what is being done in this instance.

The result of this measure will be to increase taxation on these commodities by about $150 million in a full year.

Not only are the sales tax and the excise tax changed in this way but a number of other tax items are included in this bill.

The air transportation tax is modified. It has been increased by 1 per cent to a new total of 10 per cent. This is a tax on air transportation, as I think senators are aware, and the increase of 1 per cent has been brought in in order to finance the limitation of the tax to a ceiling of $50 per trip. This limitation has been brought in to meet the special situation of long distance travellers, many of whom live in remote parts of the country. It was thought more equitable to put a ceiling on this tax of $50 per trip, and in order to finance the imposition of the ceiling, the tax itself was increased by 1 per cent so that other travellers will, of course, make up this difference.

There is also a change in sales tax provisions and in the tax on tourist literature. This has long been a source of irritation to people in the tourist industry. They have had to pay a sales tax on some of the literature that they use which has had the effect of putting them in what they thought to be an unfair competitive position with literature of this kind that was coming from other quarters, and particularly outside the country. That sales tax has been dealt with by means of a proposal to refund the tax to those people who are paying it at the present time. It was thought that this would eliminate a long-standing complaint of the tourist industry.

There has been another important change which has to do with the tax rebates that are given to primary producers, farmers in particular, with respect to farm fuels. Two things are being done here. The period of relief from the sales and excise tax that was previously in force has been extended by another year; and the total amount of the rebate has been increased so that it now amounts to about 5.5 cents per litre for those in the farms of the country who are eligible. The cost of these two changes, for which the government forgoes revenues, in a fiscal year would be about $230 million.

Honourable senators, some other items in this bill should be noted. There is an arrangement to allow a rebate of gasoline tax to certain diplomats in the country. This is, I understand, to be imposed on the basis of reciprocity, so that if rebates are given to our diplomats in other countries, then the same courtesy will be extended to foreign diplomats in Canada.

There is also a revision of the rules on garnisheeing, which makes it a little more practical for legal action to be undertaken.

There are other minor changes in the tax mechanism which perhaps are not worthy of detailed comment.

Honourable senators, that is the substance of the bill. It has been the subject of a pre-study by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and that committee reported to this house quite some time ago that it should be favourably considered.

However, I want to take advantage of this opportunity to unburden myself of a couple of points in connection with the principles of sales taxation which have always given me some concern.

• (1650)

One has to do with the fact that the federal sales tax at the manufacturer's level often becomes a much higher percentage when the retail price of a commodity is calculated. The fact is that in many instances the sales tax imposed at the manufacturer's level becomes part of the tax of the price mark-up system. As a consequence, by the time those mark-ups are made from the wholesaler to the retailer through to the consumer, that 3 per cent tax, or whatever it is, becomes something higher. When it is possible to pass on this escalation of the tax because of the mark-up system, that is done; sometimes it is not possible and it is not done, but there it is.

I have always been one of those who thought that it would be a good thing to look for other means by which to raise money, means that would avoid this unpleasant system of mark-up, but I do not know whether that will come to pass. Now that we are considering a business transfer tax, it may be possible to devise arrangements such that when this tax is imposed it does not become part of the mark-up escalation. Perhaps I am optimistic and that may not prove to be the case, but I simply wanted to share with the Senate my view that it would be desirable to do that, because otherwise the impact of taxation becomes something other than what we think we are doing or recommending when the tax is passed here.

The second aspect of the sales tax legislation which I think concerns us all is the fact that it is a regressive tax. In my time, I have had the unpleasant duty to propose sales taxes in other jurisdictions, and I know that such taxes are regressive. There is the general feeling that we should see that regressive taxes do not get out of control. I think that in many instances the sales tax is highly appropriate to be relied upon as a source of revenue, but its regressive feature ought to receive some consideration.

Senator Frith: What does "regressive" mean in that context, senator?

Senator Roblin: It means that it bears more heavily upon the poor than it does upon the rich as a proportion of their income. That would be my off-the-cuff definition. I thought that the term was so well used that even Senator Frith would understand it, but perhaps it is his legal mind which requires a more concrete definition.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps it is because he is sitting in the opposition.

Senator Frith: Not for long, I hope.

Senator Roblin: Hope springs eternal in the human breast. I do not, as a rule, indulge in prophecy in matters of this kind, but I would not advise my friend to get too itchy at the moment, because he is going to be there for a little while, at any rate.

As far as this matter goes, however, there is this question of equity in connection with taxation which has always concerned legislators, and I think it concerns this chamber. I mention this because, although it is not in the present bill, there is a bill to come before us which will bear on this matter; that is, there is to be a tax credit rebate available for persons in the lower income groups in the country. That will amount in the case of a family of four to $150 per family, which, according to the figures I have seen, is considerably greater than the extra taxation that is being imposed by this piece of legislation.

Honourable senators, we have at least a bit of a handle on this question of the regressive nature of sales taxes. I for one am glad to see it. It may be that this will be expanded upon in days to come; who is to know? But as far as I am aware, this is certainly the first time in this nation that we have taken such a step in order to bring some measure of equity to bear on the regressive nature of taxes of this kind. I want to encourage anyone who is pursuing this line of policy-making to continue with it, because I think that it is an extremely valuable one to espouse and to bring into being as part of the tax law of the country.

Honourable senators, that is the bill. There are two points about sales taxes that I do not like: One is their regressive nature, the other is the mark-up characteristic. There is some hope that we will be able to do something about both of those things. If we do, I will certainly be very happy to support it.

I should report to the Senate that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, as a result of its pre-study, reported to us that the bill should be favourably considered when it arrives here. That is certainly my recommendation to honourable senators today.

On motion of Senator Leblanc, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On orders Nos. 9, 10, 11 and 12:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Orders Nos. 9 and 10 stand in my name and deal with the consideration of reports of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. Order No. 11, which stands in Senator van Roggen's name, deals with the consideration of a report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which report has to do with a budget. The same can be said of order No. 12. All of those orders were put over until today so that senators would have an opportunity to examine the budgets, which were to appear in the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of yesterday. Unfortunately, we have not yet received those Debates and Minutes, so I suggest that we stand these orders until tomorrow.

Orders stand.

COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

THIRTY-SECOND CONFERENCE HELD IN LONDON, ENGLAND, FROM SEPTEMBER 23 TO OCTOBER 2, 1986—INQUIRY STANDS

On Inquiry No. 1:

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, as an indication of my kindly sensitivity, I do not plan to speak to this matter today but will do so tomorrow. I would, however, like leave of the Senate to table a document, which is the report of the conference that was prepared by the Parliamentary Relations office and tabled by the Honourable Lloyd Crouse in the other place some time ago. I commend this document to senators. It is lengthy and I therefore desist from suggesting that it be printed as part of today's proceedings, and I might add that this has nothing to do with the fact that yesterday's Hansard has not yet appeared.

Inquiry stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

DELAY IN PRODUCTION OF DEBATES AND MINUTES—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am rising on what I would regard as a question of privilege which affects members of the Senate and the proper functioning of this legislative chamber.

Yesterday we met and began our proceedings without the benefit of either Hansard—which is the record of the debates—for the preceding day and without the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. Despite the absence of this necessary material, we overlooked the situation and continued with our business.

I think it would have been quite proper to raise a point of order and to argue that the Senate could not proceed legitimately or lawfully with its business in the absence of the proper order of business that ought to be on the desk of each senator. However, that was not done. Today, however, we are meeting for the second time without the official transcript of the debates of the Senate. The situation has improved today in the sense that we now have the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, but we do not yet have Hansard, the actual debates of yesterday.

Honourable senators, it is my view that the first priority for the printing establishment should be the Parliament of Canada, and the Parliament of Canada is comprised of two chambers—the House of Commons and the Senate. That ought to be the first priority. I think that traditionally that priority has been met. It certainly was met yesterday and today with respect to the House of Commons, because all the necessary documentation, including Hansard, the Orders of the Day—the projected order of business—has been provided to the members of the House of Commons.

One wonders how it is that the Senate has been relegated to a lower status and why is it, as we are told—not from any person in authority—that other printing has been undertaken by the Printing Bureau and the work of the Senate has been put aside?

I do not intend to make a point of this against the government at all; I do not know whether, in fact, it is the responsibility of the government to ensure that the necessary documentation is available for the Senate. It would be the responsibility of the Speaker of the Senate to ensure that our privileges are protected. Therefore, I am raising the subject. I believe it would be useful for the Senate to consider asking the Queen's Printer to come before the Senate at the earliest possible moment to explain why a lower priority has been accorded to the work of the Senate. If that requires a motion, I would be pleased to make such a motion at the appropriate time to call the officials from the Printing Bureau before the Bar of the Senate to explain why the publishing of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate for the 16th and now the 17th day of December has been delayed. That would be the form of the motion that I would propose, but I will not move it at the moment. I am giving notice that I have it in mind.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have to admit that I have great difficulty in arguing with any of the points raised by my honourable friend across the way. It was with great embarrassment yesterday that I announced to this chamber that we did not have the necessary materials before us to consider properly the work that we had to do. I am very appreciative of the fact that our colleagues on both sides of the house agreed to go along with the business of the Senate and expedite the business at hand.

Today, as Senator MacEachen has said, we are faced with a somewhat less difficult position but, nevertheless, a difficult position. I must commend the officials at the Table for their work today in persuading the people at the Printing Bureau to provide at least the Minutes in time for us to proceed, and also with the Debates of the Senate of the day before yesterday with which to work today. It is almost like trying to find a Globe and Mail in Newfoundland. In Newfoundland, I am told, if you want today's Globe and Mail, you will have to go to the store tomorrow. That is the sort of system they seem to be applying to the Senate, and that is completely unacceptable.

I agree with Senator MacEachen that the time has come for the representatives of the Printing Bureau, the Queen's Printer or whoever, to appear before some body or group responsible for the management of the Senate to explain to us exactly where their priorities lie and why they differentiate between the two houses of Parliament. It may very well be that the Internal Economy Committee might seize itself of the opportunity to look into this matter for us. Perhaps it might even be the Rules Committee, but I suspect that the management committee might be the more appropriate one. I would ask the chairman and deputy chairman of that committee to give the matter some consideration and perhaps in the not-to-distant future to bring these people before us to tell us exactly how they intend to deal with the affairs of the Senate in the future.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I doubt that it is appropriate to have this matter referred to a committee. This is something that affects very directly our ability to do our work in this chamber, and if it is an affront, as I believe it is, to anyone, it is not an affront to our Internal Economy Committee or to our administration; it is an affront to every one of us, and I would like the person responsible for that decision to know that we take the matter very seriously.

Honourable senators, I know this step has never been taken in the time that I have been in this chamber, but then I cannot remember an occasion when it was more appropriate to have the persons responsible called before the Bar of the Senate to explain to all of us the reasons for that decision. I do not think it appropriate to ask them to come before the Internal Economy Committee and then for us to wait for a report in due course. They will not take that seriously. However, if we ask them to come here before the Bar of the Senate and explain to all of us—not to a committee of the Senate; not to the Leader of the Government; not to the Speaker but to every one of us—then they will know that we mean business.

I think that this case does justify the motion that was suggested by Senator MacEachen. I think the motion should be made and that the person responsible should appear here tomorrow to explain why this decision was made. We will find out the facts tomorrow, but I understand there is very persuasive evidence that this delay was not caused because the Printing Bureau had too large a back-log of parliamentary proceedings; there is evidence that a decision was made to print other things. Therefore, it seems as if someone said: "We cannot get this job done and do our duty to the House of Commons and the Senate," and that someone else said: "Don't worry about the Senate. Get that job done and we will get the Minutes and Debates over to the Senate whenever we can." Now, we do not know whether that is so—I only say that to indicate the kind of information I think we should get tomorrow. I think it justifies a motion that the persons responsible be called before the Senate tomorrow to explain why they are not giving it the priority they should.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I can only say that I share Senator Frith's concern in this matter. However, I would hate to be too precipitate in this particular regard. I would like to inquire a little bit further and perhaps discuss the matter outside before we pass such a motion to bring these people before the Bar of the Senate. I think that we can always make that decision; that can always be done. Perhaps we should try to find out a little bit more about the matter before we do that. But, as always, I am completely in the hands of the majority of senators, and if it is their desire at this point to move such a motion, obviously, that is what will be done and tomorrow we will have these people before us. I personally am more inclined to the sober second thought process and would like to have some time to discuss and consider this matter before we make that move.

Senator Frith: Well, I am perfectly sober and I have now given it second thought, and I still think that is what we should do.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Doody: That is the message I tried to get across on Bill C-11, but it did not work.

BANK OF CANADA

APPOINTMENT OF JOHN CROW AS GOVERNOR

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I think a number of senators—possibly everybody in this chamber—would want to extend to the government our thanks for and our appreciation of the appointing of John Crow as the successor to Governor Bouey in the Bank of Canada. Mr. Crow is an eminent economist. He has had extensive experience in international finance at IMF and has served with distinction in the Bank of Canada since he joined it some years ago. I hope, honourable senators, that this is a precursor of the kind of appointments that we will see, where people of experience and knowledge in businesses are promoted from within.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR BARBADOS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to take this opportunity to call the attention of the members of the Senate to the presence in the gallery of a very distinguished representative of another Commonwealth country, Peter George Morgan, High Commissioner for Barbados, whom we are so happy to see with us and whom we welcome to Canada as the new High Commissioner.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS and urges that the Senate and the House of Commons and the Legislative Assemblies of the other provinces do likewise.

OFFICIAL REPORT

CORRECTION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to call the attention of the Senate to what appears to be an error in yesterday's Debates of the Senate which just arrived on my desk.

The error occurs at the bottom of page 342 where it says:

Of course, Senator Stewart's comments and guidelines on the Ministry of Defence are well taken.

I believe what I actually said was, "...on the minister's defence..." rather than "...the Ministry of Defence...".

Honourable senators, the error in Hansard is quite understandable since I am not well known for using either of the two official languages with any great facility. I simply call that to the attention of the editors, because the Ministry of Defence really needs no defence at this time. [Corrected]

NATIONAL FINANCE

LEAVE GRANTED TO PRESENT REPORT OF COMMITTEE LATER THIS DAY

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, the National Finance Committee met this morning to examine supplementary estimates (B) but the report has not been completed yet. I will receive it later this afternoon.

Therefore I ask leave to revert to this item when I receive the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

LEAVE GRANTED TO PRESENT REPORT OF COMMITTEE LATER THIS DAY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I believe that Senator Sinclair, as Chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, finds himself in the same situation as Senator Leblanc.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON SENATE ESTIMATES FOR 1987-88 TABLED

Hon. Royce Frith, for Hon. Guy Charbonneau, tabled the Seventh Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, the Senate estimates for the fiscal year 1987-88.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Frith: I move that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Honourable senators, if I might explain, the estimates will be tabled and I am going to ask honourable senators to approve the budget tomorrow.

Senator Doody: The "boojit."

Senator Frith: My pronunciation was a bit too western for Senator Doody's taste.

Honourable senators who are interested in looking at the budget or the summary of the budget will have an opportunity to do so providing the printers pull up their socks. We will have something to look at when I ask for approval of the budget tomorrow.

Motion agreed to.

EIGHTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Hon. Royce Frith, for Hon. Guy Charbonneau, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Thursday, December 18, 1986

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

EIGHTH REPORT

Your Committee has examined and approved the supplementary budget presented to it by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries for the proposed expenditures of the said Committee with respect to its examination of all aspects of the marketing of fish in Canada, and all implications thereof, as authorized by the Senate on October 28, 1986. The said supplementary budget is as follows:

Transportation and Communications
Respectfully submitted,

$15,135

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?
Hon. Senators: Agreed.

GUY CHARBONNEAU
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Frith: With leave, now—and I will explain.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, this is a budget supplementary to one that was already approved for the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries. It was presented to the Internal Economy Committee this morning. The request for additional funds arises because the Fisheries Committee, when it travelled out west to examine and report on the west coast fisheries, had part of its trip cancelled because of bad weather. The chairman of that committee informed us this morning that it was an important leg of their journey which does need to be completed. That is the explanation for the request.

If any honourable senator wishes to examine this report in more detail, I will be happy to adjourn the request for approval. If not, I suggest that we approve it now.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE SENATE

DELAY IN PRODUCTION OF DEBATES AND MINUTES—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I give notice of the following motion:

That officials from the Canadian Government Printing Bureau be called before the Bar of the Senate to explain the delay in the publishing of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if my understanding is correct, this arises as a matter of privilege. Therefore, there is no notice, as such, required, but the motion will now take its place at the end of today's proceedings when motions are called. That means that if someone can talk us out of this with a good explanation, of course there is time between now and then to do so.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, at this point I usually move the adjournment motion for the date and hour of the reconvening of the Senate, but since the order of business at this point is rather uncertain and we are not quite sure about the order in which legislation will arrive from the other place, I ask permission to revert to Notices of Motions later this day.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

TRADE—IMPOSITION OF U.S. TARIFFS ON CANADIAN FOREST PRODUCTS—MITIGATION OF HARMFUL EFFECTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I want to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he has even a sliver of information with respect to the threatened U.S. action against the lumber industry in Canada. It remains a matter of serious importance not only in British Columbia but in other wood-producing provinces. Has he any further information today, some news that can send us joyously into the holidays?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I hope my honourable friend will not be going joyously into the holidays today, because the house will, no doubt, be sitting tomorrow. Having said that, all I can say about the matter he has raised is that the government has rejected the latest proposition from the United States on the ground that it would have infringed our sovereignty.

Senator Perrault: Needless to say, this will be a difficult Christmas for many people involved in the lumber industry in this country. They will not be eating escargots and pheasant under glass—many of them will be having a tough time at the food bank. This is serious business indeed for thousands of Canadians from coast to coast.

Honourable senators, on June 4 last I directed a series of questions to the government leader's predecessor. I asked about the impact of the American action against shakes and shingles. His reply was this:

The full impact of this American action has not yet been assessed—it does not come into effect until June 6—but when it is assessed the government will decide what to do in order to be of some service to the people of the province of British Columbia who are affected. Whether it will involve this legislation—

—which I will come to in a moment,

—or not I can't say. It is possible, but we will have to see how the matter develops.

I remind the Leader of the Government that in 1970 when a Liberal government was faced with retaliatory action by the United States, we introduced legislation to provide a means by which to support levels of employment in Canadian industry when other countries imposed temporary import surtaxes or took other actions having an adverse effect upon employment in Canadian industry. The aggregate of all amounts it is possible to expend, pursuant to subsection 1 of that act, totals $80 million. That is precisely the amount of money the Minister of Finance stated in the other place would be realized as a result of the so-called retaliatory action against the United States.

● (1420)

My question is this: The shingle workers have been waiting for over six months for some action by the government to provide alternative employment or to retrain them in new skills. Is the Leader of the Government prepared to announce today what, in fact, has been done with the money that was to be realized as a result of this measure, and is it being spent to help these unemployed workers?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will have to study the honourable senator's question very carefully in order to formulate a response. I get the impression that he is mixing up at least two issues.

Senator Perrault: I am not mixing up two issues at all. The Minister of Finance stated in the other place that $80 million would be realized as the end result of the U.S. action which was taken against the Canadian shake and shingle industry. I would refer the Leader of the Government to the line of questioning as it is recorded in the Debates of the Senate of June 4, 1986.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know what the honourable senator is talking about when he talks about realizing $80 million from actions that have been taken by the government against the Canadian shake and shingle industry. I just do not understand what he is talking about. I shall have to read his question more carefully.

Senator Perrault: I am talking about the extra cost to Canadian producers of shingles and shakes as a result of this tariff—the economic effect. I refer the Leader of the Government to page 2543 of Hansard of June 4.

Senator Murray: As a result of what measure?

Senator Perrault: As a result of the American attempt to restrict the flow of Canadian shakes and shingles into the United States market, which has had a devastating effect on our industry.

An Hon. Senator: How many people have become unemployed?

Senator Perrault: As a result of this action, we have taken certain measures against the United States.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we have taken certain measures against the United States, to which the honourable senator referred yesterday in his question concerning a tariff on English language books.

Senator Perrault: That is the retaliation.

Senator Murray: Yes. We took that retaliatory measure because we thought it was important to send a message to the United States that they could not with impunity discriminate against us in the way they had done. We continue to believe that the retaliatory measures we have taken will prove to be effective.

Yesterday the honourable senator asked a question as to why the Canadian measure was applicable only to English language books. The answer to that question is that books in other languages are bound, as the expression goes, by our agreements in the GATT.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, why has the government taken a scatter-gun approach in this measure against the United States? Why are we hitting all our friendly allies simultaneously? Why are we hitting the Japanese, the British, the New Zealanders and the Australians? The Leader of the Government said yesterday that this measure was not a revenue producing one. May I remind him that the Minister of Finance estimated that the so-called retaliatory tariff against the Americans, in response to this action against our shake and shingle industry, will extract an extra $80 million from Canadian pockets. He made that claim in the other chamber. I am asking today: How much of that money has been spent to date to help the shake and shingle workers who have been adversely affected, and is there any intention on the part of the government to invoke the provisions that are still on the statute books, passed into law in 1970, to meet precisely these problems that are facing the workers of Canada? That is the question, and it is not necessary for the leader to waffle.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have not seen, and I am not sure the honourable senator has seen—certainly he has not placed it before the Senate—any precise documentation as to the effect of the measure taken by the United States on our industry or on unemployment in our lumber industry. I have not seen that evidence. However, I will undertake to try to obtain it from the appropriate departments of the government, and also to bring in an answer to his final question as to whether we might avail ourselves of some legislative authority that he says was given to the government in a previous Parliament.

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Government earlier accused me of confusion. The only confusion exists on the government side. The Leader of the Government has asked me to produce evidence that the people have been affected. His predecessor in this chamber gave the commitment over six months ago that the damage would be assessed and the government would decide what to do in order to be of service to the people of the provinces affected; yet, we are going into Christmas with many of them having to rely on food banks in my province and in other provinces across the country. It is not good enough to treat Canadian workers in this way.

ENERGY

MONITORING OF OIL AND GAS COMPANIES FOLLOWING TERMINATION OF PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX— REQUEST FOR REPLY

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to ask the Leader of the Government a question concerning the use of the funds that were released following the removal of the PGRT, the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax. I acknowledge that he was good enough to arrange for his office to send me a copy of pages 79 and 80 of this session's Debates of the Senate which contained an answer relating to the problem.

However, I have to tell him that there is a great deal of slippage between what is indicated in that reply and what the government promised some time ago, when it claimed that it had pledges from the companies involved as to what they were going to do with the several hundred million dollars of tax relief. Under the old system in the other place, one was entitled to a reply, but not necessarily an answer—and I guess that is what I have got.

I do not want to be flippant with the Leader of the Government because, as with the previous question, there are several thousand people in my part of Canada who are desperately depending on some action out in the field. The government said at the time that it relieved the PGRT that it had a commitment, or that it was going to see to it, that the $700 million or $500 million—whatever the relief amounted to—was going to be used for additional activity.

The answer that I received on October 28 was that one company had indicated that it was going to increase its exploration and development program. That company was Chevron. I will read just one sentence of the rest of the answer. It says:

... when the report is received—

That is, from the petroleum monitoring agency:

—if anything unexpected appears, the government will address the situation with the companies at that time.

It is now December 18, and I really cannot understand why we could not have an answer to that question. A great deal of the exploration and development activity out in the field has to be done when the ground is frozen. In other words, in central and northern Alberta, in Saskatchewan and in British Columbia, there is a great deal of what is commonly called muskeg, which is swampy type of land that will support machinery on its surface only when it is frozen. If we do not have some plans now for companies to budget for some activity, and for the service companies to respond to that, and thus creating the jobs, or re-establishing the jobs, it simply will not be done this winter.

Therefore, I plead with the Leader of the Government to obtain a reply from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in time so that it can be useful for the purposes which the government described when it announced the tax relief.

● (1430)

Senator Olson: I have a supplementary question: Could we obtain it before we adjourn for the Christmas holidays? If the

[Senator Olson.]

Senate were sitting next week, we could obtain it then, but the Senate is not scheduled to meet again until the third or fourth week of January and I will not have an opportunity—other than by making telephone calls—to get in touch with the leader, so I ask the leader if he could bring that information to the Senate tomorrow.

Senator Murray: I will give an undertaking that I will make an inquiry today.

EMPLOYMENT

SUMMER YOUTH EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I should like to get back to the question of the immediate future of young Canadians.

When young Canadians go home for the Christmas holidays, they do so not only to celebrate the season and get their clothes washed but to arrange summer employment. The federal government's summer employment program has often been announced before the Christmas holidays; this year the announcement of whatever program will be in place for 1987—I assume Challenge '87—will not be made until January.

Could the leader tell us whether he has any information on that program and, specifically, whether students can anticipate more or less the same sort of program as was available to them last year?

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

INUUVIK—WITHDRAWAL OF ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL— EFFECT ON ECONOMY

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, yesterday I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question concerning the town of Inuvik and the fact that 20 per cent of the population of that town had been removed when the military left. I was accused by the Leader of the Government in the Senate and by Senator Flynn of overreacting and not being very intelligent in the way I had asked the question.

I have read the blues and, quite frankly, honourable senators, I find that if anything, I was not strong enough yesterday.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: I do not seem to have made the impression on the other side that this is a serious situation. The Leader of the Government in the Senate comes from eastern Canada and knows what it is to have the federal government push people around. He was also around when Mr. Diefenbaker was Prime Minister, a man who knew something about northern vision; a man who understood the north.

I am asking, on behalf of the residents of northern Canada, the following question: Does the government not think that removing 20 per cent of the population of a community the size of Inuvik is something serious enough to raise in the Senate?

Senator Bonnell: I think you're great!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I did not suggest the honourable senator should not ask questions; I suggested to him that if he wanted to debate the matter, he should debate it at the appropriate time.

If there is some particular piece of information he needs on the matter, I will undertake to obtain that for him as soon as possible. I have already asked for a report on the matter he raised yesterday so that I may have it at hand in the event of further questions, or when and if the honourable senator avails himself of the opportunity to debate the matter.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, the appropriate time to ask questions concerning the Northwest Territories is when employment is down to nothing! The oil policy just passed has completely taken away any employment opportunities for the people of the north.

The government has decided to build a Class 8 icebreaker in southern Canada; it plans on manning it with southern sailors; it plans on taking it to the north to demonstrate sovereignty. It seems to me that now is the appropriate time to wonder what the policies of this government are. That is what I was trying to establish yesterday.

Is it the policy of the government that it will establish sovereignty by removing all of the residents of the north and sending southerners up there, who will then return to southern Canada and spend their money there?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am interested to hear that the honourable senator is opposed to the construction of an icebreaker which is required to help demonstrate Canada's sovereignty in the north.

As far as the depressed conditions in the mineral and oil and gas industries are concerned, the honourable senator knows perfectly well those depressed conditions are not due to any policy of this government but because of the fall in world prices for those products.

Senator Lucier: I am certainly glad the leader has given me the opportunity to tell him that I think building a Class 8 icebreaker to show sovereignty in the north at this time is probably one of the dumbest ideas I have ever heard. It will not show sovereignty; all it will do is break the ice so that foreign submarines can surface.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: I would like to see you shoot down a MiG-21 from an icebreaker. As far as that is concerned, this government is going to spend half a billion dollars on an icebreaker to show sovereignty when someone can come in with a Twin Otter and set an Exocet missile on the ice to knock the unarmed icebreaker out of the water.

If the government wants to build an icebreaker to break ice, I am all in favour of that, but as far as showing sovereignty in the north is concerned, that is the dumbest thing I have ever heard.

Senator Perrault: They should build a Class 8 prison instead.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

PROPOSED NATIONAL FORUM—CURRENT STATUS

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a very pacific question. On October 28 I read the following sentence from the Speech from the Throne:

To help meet challenges facing higher education, my government will propose a national forum on post-secondary education, to be held early next year.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government could tell us how plans are advancing for the holding of that national forum on post-secondary education.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the Secretary of State has been pursuing consultations on this matter with some of the key organizations, such as the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada. The minister has been in touch with the various ministers of education and hopes to be in a position shortly to meet with the chairman of the Council of Ministers of Education and, indeed, with the council itself.

When that is done, the minister hopes that consultations will be sufficiently advanced to enable a decision to be made on the timing for and the agenda of that forum.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. This morning I received a disturbing telegram from the administration of the Okanagan Indian Band at Vernon, British Columbia. It states in part:

Postpone the enrolment of any and all students not yet attending classes.

That refers to students attending post-secondary institutions.

In the case of the Vernon band with over a thousand members, this means it will not be able to send 12 students to university after Christmas.

This is a very serious situation. Education holds the key to the future for our people; education is where all our hopes lie. Education is an area that should not be cut back in any circumstance, especially post-secondary education.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government could tell us what is happening with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and perhaps make a pitch to his colleague that this kind of policy should be reversed if, indeed, there is such a policy to cut back on post-secondary education funding for native peoples.

The honourable senator has quoted from a telegram he received from the Okanagan Indian Band on this subject. I have no information from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on the matter, but if the honourable senator will let me have a copy of the telegram, I will undertake to look into the matter.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

MALISEET NATION LAND CLAIM—REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF IMPARTIAL NEGOTIATORS

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I would like to draw to his attention a rather sad situation that exists with respect to the negotiation of the Indian land claim of the Maliseet Nation at Tobique in New Brunswick. I am sure the Leader of the Government in the Senate is familiar with the locality and the people there.

For months the people of the band have been sending signals to the minister and the higher officials in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to the effect that the negotiating team and legal counsel from that department, with whom the band have been negotiating in an attempt to come to a sensible and early resolution of their land claim, have not, in fact, been playing ball at all. They have invoked just about every argument in the book to stall and delay to the point where I for one find it rather offensive. I am sorry that I have not had a chance to broach this matter with the honourable leader earlier, but, like many of us in this chamber and in the other place, he may have received correspondence from the Chief at Maliseet.

What is at the very heart of the matter here is a principle which was outlined by a rather eminent jurist who now sits on the bench of the Supreme Court of Canada, but who then was Professor Gérard La Forest. With respect to the process of negotiating band claims, he said, and I quote:

... the important thing is that if such a process is to be successful, it must be acceptable to the Indians. For if there is any purpose, apart from the demands of justice, in resolving specific claims, it is to remove the pin pricks that bedevil the government's relations with the Indians.

I repeat that for months the present Maliseet Chief and his predecessor have been endeavouring to get the negotiators from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to lay everything on the table, but every time that attempt is made, they are pricked again, they are clawed, they are scratched and really they do not know whom to address any more.

[Senator Marchand.]

They have written to every member of Parliament in both houses; they have appealed to successive ministers and now, on their behalf, I appeal to the Leader of the Government in the Senate to have a look at this matter to see if he can convince his colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to send in negotiators with an open mind and who respect the principles of negotiation so well outlined by Justice Gérard La Forest when he was a professor.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am sure the honourable senator will appreciate that I am not familiar with the details of the negotiations with the Maliseet Indians. I can say that this morning the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Mr. McKnight, announced significant amendments to the comprehensive land claims policy. I hope that the amendments to the policy announced by the minister will have overtaken the situation described by my honourable friend and will help to resolve it in a timely fashion.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I thank the government leader for that very timely information. I am sure that the policy and guidelines are well intended and probably meant to overcome some of the obstacles that have lain in the way of the resolution of some of these long outstanding claims.

However, I repeat that the heart of the concern of the Indians is not to receive another set of guidelines; it is to deal with people with a heart and with understanding. Unless you have in place a bureaucracy that interprets the intent of the guidelines and rules, you will keep on returning to square one. This has been happening for the last 14 years. It is not only this government that is at fault but the previous one also. What the Indians want is sympathetic understanding. They do not have at their disposal all of the information they require. They are not "à la fine pointe de la technologie" in a number of matters. They want their position to be heard; they want their concerns to be heard and they have had more than enough of this "bureaucratise", which has literally poisoned the relationship between this particular band and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Honourable senators, I do not believe I have anything more to add. It is people we are concerned about, not guidelines.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know who the negotiators are and I certainly do not know the extent to which the problems in the Maliseet negotiations are attributable to the individuals who have been appointed to negotiate. However, I do know that the announcement made this morning by Mr. McKnight was made following a report by a commission headed by Mr. Murray Coolican, a report which was very well received in the country, and particularly by the native organizations. In fact, we were being urged by all of the native organizations to respond in a timely fashion to that report. We have done so and I think that the honourable senator will find that far from being a further complication or an addition to the bureaucratic machinery, the policy announced by my colleague will have the effect of simplifying it and, as he puts it, breaking the logjam and settling many of the claims that have eluded us for so long.

THE ENVIRONMENT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—ALLEGED POLLUTION OF HILLSBOROUGH HARBOUR—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I read in our local newspaper that the Minister of the Environment has threatened to sue the farmers and hog producers of Prince Edward Island because of purported contamination of Hillsborough Harbour from a new Garden slaughter house plant that was built in the riding of the then Premier Lee of Prince Edward Island.

I also note that the Minister of Industry from the province of Prince Edward Island reports that the provincial health inspectors say that there is no contamination going into that harbour. On the other hand, the Minister of the Environment for Canada states that the federal health inspectors have reported that there is contamination going into that harbour. Finally, the provincial Minister of Industry states that the Province of Prince Edward Island has no money to put in another treatment plant.

My question is: Will the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations speak to the federal Minister of the Environment and ask whether his department will bear the cost of this million dollar plant to further treat the offal from the Garden meat plant before it empties into the Hillsborough River? In the same way as the minister has offered to spend millions of dollars to clear the Halifax Harbour and as he has offered millions of dollars to clear Sydney Harbour, perhaps he could spend one little million for his own native province and let the farmers of that province continue to produce hogs and beef. I am sure that if the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations speaks to his colleague, the Minister of the Environment, it will carry some weight.

● (1450)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am not aware that the offers of financial assistance to Halifax and Sydney that Senator Bonnell refers to have in fact been made by my colleague. In any case, I do not have any information on the Charlottetown problem; I will obtain some from Mr. McMillan and bring it to the Senate at the first opportunity.

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED TUNNEL OR CAUSEWAY BETWEEN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND MAINLAND—FEASIBILITY STUDY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I have another question which has nothing to do with environment other than the Northumberland Strait. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise me if the cabinet made a decision today to fund a study for a permanent link between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island? If so, how much did they fund and who got the contract?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ALLEGED MISUSE OF MANITOBA INDIAN BAND FUNDS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Earlier this fall there were some serious accusations made about the operations of the Department of Indian Affairs in the province of Manitoba. Subsequent to that, at least two investigations were launched by the government, possibly three. I wonder if the minister could advise us when we might expect to receive the reports of those investigations?

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers. I will follow the usual procedure. If an honourable senator does not suggest that an answer be read aloud, I will simply ask that it be printed as part of today's proceedings.

ENERGY

MONITORING OF USE OF FUNDS FOLLOWING TERMINATION OF PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX—GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION IN SYNCRUDE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on December 16 last by the Honourable Senator Olson regarding Energy—Monitoring of Use of Funds Following Termination of Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax—Government Participation in Syncrude.

(The answer follows:)

The proposal presented by the Province of Alberta concerning Syncrude is still under consideration by the federal government.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—ROLE OF WOMEN AND HOMOSEXUALS—WHITE PAPER—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on December 16 last by the Honourable Senator Molgat regarding National Defence—Canadian Armed Forces—Role of Women and Homosexuals—White Paper—Government Policy.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I wonder if we might have the answer on the white paper read, if it is not too lengthy. I suspect that it is short.

Senator Doody: I can assure the honourable senator it is not very lengthy. It states:

The government will be presenting a White Paper on National Defence in the Spring of 1987.

Senator Frith: Neither lengthy nor neatly.

JUSTICE

CANADA COMMISSION OF INQUIRY ON WAR CRIMINALS— STATUS OF REPORT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on December 17 last by the Honourable Senator Haidasz regarding Justice—Canada Commission of Inquiry on War Criminals—Status of Report.

(The answer follows:)

At the request of the Commission, their mandate was extended until December 31st for the purpose of printing and translation. The government expects to receive the report before the new year.

FISHERIES

WEST COAST SALMON ENHANCEMENT PROGRAM— GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on December 17 last by the Honourable Senator Perrault regarding Fisheries—West Coast Salmon Enhancement Program—Government Policy.

(The answer follows:)

The notion that complete cancellation of the Salmonid Enhancement Program is being contemplated has absolutely no foundation. The federal government will maintain its commitment to Salmonid Enhancement in British Columbia, and will continue to back up that commitment with financial support.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is currently in the process of resolving future funding levels for the Salmonid Enhancement Program, and expects to be in a position to make an announcement on the matter early in the new year.

[Senator Doody.]

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

TRADE—IMPOSITION OF TARIFF ON PUBLICATIONS—AMOUNT AND DISTRIBUTION OF REVENUE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on December 17 last by the Honourable Senator Perrault regarding Canada-United States Relations—Trade—Imposition of Tariff on Publications—Amount and Distribution of Revenue.

(The answer follows:)

It was with great reluctance that the government decided to restore tariffs on certain books. This action was required, however, because of the unwarranted unilateral action taken by the U.S. to impose a 35 p.c. tariff on red cedar shakes and shingles. Canada had to send a message to the U.S. that we are not prepared to accept U.S. protectionist actions of this kind.

The fact that the U.S. tariff on shakes and shingles is not "bound" under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) left the government with very little scope in formulating a response. Most of our trade with the U.S. is in goods where tariffs are bound under GATT. The only products which could be considered were those, like books, where raising rates would not contravene Canada's international obligations. The options open to the government were extremely limited.

The tariff provision covering printed material in other than the English language is bound under GATT. As such, the imposition of a duty on this material would have violated our GATT commitment to maintain the Free rate.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1986-87

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-35, an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1987.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

[English]

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1986-87

THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved third reading of Bill C-29, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March 1987.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to make a point at third reading that arises out of reading the debates of yesterday.

When we were dealing with this bill at second reading, I pointed out that the report of the committee highlighted a number of items, raised two important questions, and all of those matters were discussed in the debates. Also, I asked about something that appeared in the report, namely, that there were six questions that the committee had not received answers to. I asked Senator Doody if, in closing the debate on second reading, he would tell me about those questions and whether we were to have answers to them. At page 342 of the Debates of the Senate, Senator Doody said the following:

With regard to the questions asked by members of the committee which had not been answered at the meeting but to which the Treasury Board agreed to furnish answers—and furnish them by the end of January 1987—there were six such questions.

Then Senator Doody went on to say:

The first one Senator Stewart has just very ably elaborated on—

Senator Stewart having done that yesterday, and then Senator Doody referred to the second question, the third question, the fourth question, the fifth question and the sixth question, but only to describe to us what those questions were, not to give us the answers, because he had been informed, I assume, that the answers were to be given by the end of January 1987.

Some of the questions that appeared were not answered: I pick, for example, a question put by Senator Stewart about the courtroom facilities at Pictou County. That rings a bit of a bell. Pictou County is Pictou, is it? Pictou County.

An Hon. Senator: Pictou.

Senator Frith: Now I hear another pronunciation. Pas Pictou, Pictou. Anyway, we know what we are talking about by now, because everyone will recognize the name by the various accents it has worn here today.

Senator Doody: It is the one where the courthouse is.

Senator Frith: What riding is that town in?

Senator Phillips: It is in Pictou.

Senator Frith: What riding is it in?

Senator Murray: Central Nova.

Senator Frith: Central Nova. Now that riding, I think, at one time was represented by the Prime Minister. The point is, we do not have an answer as to whether the grant for construction of courtroom facilities in that riding was an isolated incident or whether similar grants were made for courtroom facilities in other counties.

There has been a great deal of concern about the building and construction taking place in the Prime Minister's present riding. The point I want to make, honourable senators, is that the examination of estimates and appropriation bills is traditionally an occasion to raise questions arising out of particular items, not necessarily dealing with whether the amount is excessive or not. That is one example. I would underline that we are being asked to pass this appropriation bill without having the answers to those questions and, therefore, without having a chance to examine some political or other considerations which might arise from them.

As we have said, we do not want to delay supply any more than we want to refuse it. On the other hand, our good nature can be taken advantage of in that respect if important questions are not answered in time for second or third reading of appropriation bills.

While I intend to vote in support of this motion for third reading now, I ask both the committee chairman and the Deputy Leader of the Government to advise the officials that we would like to have answers to these questions before we are asked to pass the appropriation bill.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, the point raised by Senator Frith is a valid one. It would, perhaps, be more pressing if the estimates were not such an ongoing process. Every two or three months we appear to have another set of estimates before us.

Treasury Board has been in the practice, in dealing with the committee, of supplying the answers to questions raised on supplementary or main estimates prior to the next session so that we can comment on the answers to questions, and so on.

If there is something of real, pressing urgency that has a bearing on whether or not supply itself is in question, then I would suspect that the committee would have pressed more vigorously for Treasury Board to supply the answer prior to the submission of the bill to Parliament.

I believe that in this particular case the standard procedure should be adequate, that is, that we expect to get the answers to these questions prior to the next set of supplementary or main estimates.

If the Senate should wish me to do so, I shall certainly make representations to try to get these answers and have them tabled prior to the next estimates arriving. I regret that it is impossible for us to get them for Senator Frith today, but, as I say, we will make every effort to get them as quickly as we can.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is what I want to underline. Everything Senator Doody says is correct insofar as help to the committee is concerned, but those matters are not of help to this body when we are being asked to vote the actual money based on the estimates.

I am asking for a change in the procedure. If the committee asks questions, and answers are not available, the officials should be advised that we would like to have the answers before we are asked to vote on the bill.

Senator Doody: That representation will certainly be made to the committee and, through the committee, to Treasury Board. In fact, if it is the desire of the Senate, it can be made directly to Treasury Board from this chamber.

I should comment in passing that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has made tremendous progress under the direction of Senator Leblanc in getting that sort of cooperation from Treasury Board. The reports are far more exhaustive and voluminous than they used to be, even under my distinguished leadership of that committee. I believe tremendous improvements have been made, but that does not mean further improvements cannot be made and I take Senator Frith's comments.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Is it long?

The Clerk at the Table: A page and a half.

Senator Leblanc: I move that the report be taken into consideration now.

[English]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Argue, who is temporarily out of the chamber, and myself, I must say that I do not think we should move on that report if it is not read from the Table and if we do not have a copy in our hands. It contains some pretty fundamental concerns on both his part and on mine.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I would ask the clerk to read the report.

A Clerk at the Table:

Senator Frith: I believe Senator Corbin's point was that if we are not going to receive copies, we would like the report read now. Now that we know we are going to receive copies, I suggest we dispense with the reading.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration later this day.

COASTAL FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Jack Marshall moved third reading of Bill C-26, to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act.

● (1510)

He said: Honourable senators, before the question is put, I have a response to a question asked by Senator Stewart having to do with the approval of the action taken by the minister relating to tuna in Nova Scotia. Before I respond with the answers provided by the department, I will pass on to the honourable senator some information I received by way of briefing notes on the Bayshore Fisheries foreign charter. This information should put matters into chronological order and might make them better understood—not by Senator Stewart but by me.

In early November Fisheries Minister Tom Siddon authorized Bayshore Fisheries of Nova Scotia to charter two Japanese vessels to catch the uncaught Canadian quota of 401 bluefin tuna for 1986.

In September of 1986 Bayshore Fisheries requested special permission from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to allocate to interested parties its St. Margaret's Bay quota of bluefin tuna in return for royalty payments. Sixty per cent of the royalties were to be paid directly to 27 fishermen involved in the inshore trap fishery, while the other 40 per cent would be retained by Bayshore Fisheries. I believe I provided that part of the answer yesterday.

The inshore trap fishery was experiencing financial difficulties since migratory bluefin tuna stocks were steering clear of the St. Margaret's Bay area. Bayshore approached numerous Canadian vessel owners to catch the quota offshore, but none of these was interested, available or properly equipped for the task. The company therefore asked that it be given permission to charter foreign vessels.

The Minister of Fisheries referred the matter to the Atlantic Regional Council for advice. At a meeting on September 26 the council members recommended that a "royalty charter" not be approved for Bayshore Fisheries. However, the council also recommended that:

... other options be explored to help the St. Margaret's Bay industry, such as diversifying the trap net fishery to include longline vessels.

In recognition of the fact that in the future Canada could lose this important quota of bluefin tuna to foreign fleets, the minister granted special permission, valid for 1986 only, to Bayshore to charter two Japanese longliners under certain conditions. Some of the conditions for the charter were that the by-catch of swordfish not exceed 40 per cent by weight and that there be Canadian observers aboard the two Japanese liners. The Japanese longliners were also ordered to provide detailed catch information on a weekly basis to Department of Fisheries and Oceans officials in Halifax.

Minister Siddon has indicated that he is satisfied with the present arrangements and will ask his department to study the impact on the fishery from an economic and scientific point of view. The department will also recommend whether such arrangements should or should not be repeated next year.

I thought that that response should be put on the record. Although the answer which I received from the department is similar and may be repetitive, I will also put it on the record.

The Bayshore charter was approved after it became evident that there were no Canadian vessels equipped with the longline technology or freezing capability to harvest the St. Margaret's Bay quota according to Japanese market specifications. Honourable senators, I even questioned that, and I was told that I have to take their word that this is so. Offshore tuna caught at sea has to be frozen to minus fifty degrees Celsius before it will be accepted in Japan. No Canadian longline vessels are currently equipped with the facilities to freeze tuna at temperatures this low.

In addition, no Canadian fishermen could be found who were experienced in longlining for tuna in offshore waters and who wanted to take on the charter. These two factors, together with three years of depressed bluefin catches in Canadian inshore waters, indicated that there was a real need to diversify the harvesting techniques of the Canadian tuna industry. Based on this need, an experimental fishery for Bayshore was approved.

By way of background information, officials of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans conducted an extensive search in September and October in Atlantic Canada and New England for a longline vessel capable of harvesting the St. Margaret's Bay quota, but were unsuccessful. The feasibility of installing the required freezing facilities on a Canadian longline vessel was also investigated, but costs were found to be prohibitive.

Honourable senators, this has been an education for me, because I was not too familiar with the tuna fishery. The Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries is examining the marketing of fish and all implications thereof. I would feel it advisable and I would make the commitment that when we start our study of fish marketing on the east coast, we will call witnesses from both of these areas and from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to delve further into the matter, if Senator Stewart feels there is a need for further clarification.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Marshall for the answer he has provided. There are three points that I would like to make. The first is that according to the information he gave us yesterday, the Japanese were allowed to fish tuna along the whole Atlantic shore of Nova Scotia from Cape North right around through to the mouth of the Bay of Fundy at the point where Canada adjoins the United States in the State of Maine. That is a very large area from which the Bayshore Company drew money as a result of catching fish.

My second point is the matter of gear. The Japanese use pelagic longlines with multiple hooks. Canadian fishermen, however, are restricted to the use of angling gear, very, very small lines or two-tended lines with no more than one hook attached to each line. That is what Senator Marshall told us yesterday. Canadian fishermen feel that the gear restrictions placed upon them are very severe. This has been a source of aggravation over the years. Why should they have to try to catch these fish, which sometimes weigh 1,000 pounds or more, on extremely small lines, as if this were strictly the sports fishery?

I asked yesterday why the minister had ultimately taken the decision that he did. What was the reason which led him to overrule all of the other factors that were adduced? Senator Marshall said that in this case the minister's decision to proceed with the charter was based on the fact that the arrangements would allow Canadians to gain experience in a new technology. I have often heard, honourable senators, that there are generally two reasons given for anything—there is the good reason and there is the real reason. I think that Senator Marshall gave us the good reason yesterday.

I find it very difficult to believe—and I suspect that Senator Marshall does also—that east coast Canadian fishermen are not familiar with pelagic longlining with multiple hooks. It seems to me that that is a technique that has been used in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland for many, many years. It is true, I gather, that the fish would have to be frozen, but that is hardly a consideration that would fall within the category of the need to gain experience in a new technology.

As I have said, honourable senators, I think that Senator Marshall has given us the good reason. I suspect that many tuna fishermen in Nova Scotia have their own ideas as to what the real reason was. However, I do not propose to say anything further on the matter.

• (1520)

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I have to agree with some of the comments made by Senator Stewart. I feel, given my limited experience in the Atlantic fishery, most of which is with the Newfoundland fishery, that the fishermen of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick are pretty good fishermen and that they may question that point as well. I repeat, the minister will ask his department to study the impact of this action on the fishery from an economic and scientific point of view. I also repeat my commitment to have our committee look at the matter. I shall notify Senator Stewart when it does so, and we can probably clear up that situation.

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I believe Senator Marshall said that tuna had to be frozen to minus 50 degrees. What is the normal temperature to which fish are frozen, and what is the reason for freezing tuna to minus 50 degrees?

Senator Marshall: I do not know the specific temperature, but it appears that the Japanese will accept fish frozen to minus 50 degrees whereas Canada will not. I am not sure whether our level is higher or lower than that of the Japanese.

Senator Doody: You can test it.

Senator Lucier: I was wondering whether this was a standard imposed by the Japanese because they can achieve it and because it would give them a unique position.

Senator Marshall: That is a good question. The reason I was given is that the Japanese will accept standards that we will not accept.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips moved the third reading of Bill C-31, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Jack Marshall, for Hon. Brenda M. Robertson, moved the third reading of Bill C-32, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

He said: Honourable senators, two questions were asked of Senator Robertson yesterday. Senator Leblanc asked whether the fishing licences of fishermen were accepted as collateral on loans to fishermen under the act. The answer is that licences are accepted as collateral only in British Columbia where the licences are attached to the boats. There is no separation of the licence from the boat.

Senator Molgat asked a question that was raised before the Fisheries Committee during its study of the freshwater fish industry. He asked whether the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act was available to freshwater fishermen in the west. The answer is that the act does apply to the freshwater fishery, but only a few fishermen of that fishery qualify each year, because most of the fishermen in that fishery are part time.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE ESTIMATES, 1986-87

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fourth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1987, which was presented earlier this day.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the adoption of the report.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, this report deals with supplementary estimates (B), which were studied by the National Finance Committee this morning. I was called out of the committee at about 11.50. While I was absent, certain things transpired in the committee. I am aware of what transpired in the committee while I was there, and I am not taking issue with anything in the report, although I do not understand some of it. But that is probably my fault.

However, I would like to refer to paragraph three of the report which reads:

During the course of the hearing, a number of policy issues were raised regarding the Special Canadian Grains Program—

I do not know where those words came from.

—such as the amount of the subsidy under the program—

I do not know whether this is an attempt to bootleg in something else, or even if it is a part of the estimates we were dealing with.

—and the elements of the formula used to calculate this subsidy. Witnesses agreed to provide information to the Committee explaining the method used to arrive at this formula. The Committee also questioned the impact of low grain prices on the market price of red meat. It was the opinion of the Committee that the policy matters raised should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

I would like to add at this point three additional items that should have been referred to in this report and, thereby, referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture. I am unable at this time to table a written amendment, but I would suggest the following: "The committee also questioned the impact of low grain prices on the market price of red meat, as well as two-priced wheat, payment to producers of the full return received by the Canadian Wheat Board for No. 1 and No. 2 red spring wheat and maintenance or the necessity of maintenance of current levels for four initial payments for the crop year commencing August 1, 1987." Those are three major policy issues that were discussed. I feel that it would be in keeping with this report if these three items were added to the report, and I have suggested where they should be included. If it is necessary, I will bring in a motion that those three items be added to this report. I believe that Senator Corbin will agree to second that motion in amendment.

• (1530)

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Was there any evidence before the committee on two-price wheat? It would be appropriate to refer to it in the report.

Senator Argue: The deputy minister was present and was questioned as to what the government's policy was with regard to this matter. He said that it was still under consideration. There was not a detailed discussion, but it was discussed this morning in committee.

Senator Sinclair: In fairness, other people have various views on this matter. I am wondering whether the committee gave them an opportunity of being heard. You say there was no evidence, but merely a discussion with the minister.

Senator Argue: With great respect to my learned colleague in the Senate, the committee also questioned the impact of low grain prices on the market price of red meat. There would be no evidence heard on that question in any full or proper forum. This item was the emergency assistance for grain and oilseed producers.

I take it that the committee was endeavouring to highlight the particular subjects that were raised, and to suggest in the report that the question of those three policy items might properly be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry at some future time. I would think that is a perfectly proper amendment, which would be in the hands of the Senate to deal with.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc (Saurel): Honourable senators, the most important aspect of the report, as Senator Argue has said, is the following, namely, that the committee feels that the administrative issues raised should be referred to the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. This committee could then consider the issues it would deem appropriate.

I think we should realize that the Committee on National Finance does not specialize in or generally deal with agriculture. However, we asked some questions of a general nature that we could then discuss this afternoon.

Since we are not experts on the subject, we suggested that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry deal with the problem, since there are a number of committee members who are specialized in that field.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, without wishing to repeat the discussion we had this morning in committee, I feel I can approve the report before us today. Obviously, a committee report must be fairly succinct and focus on the major issues.

However, I would like to point out to honourable senators that the reason for setting up this Special Canadian Grains Program is the international situation. Some of us specifically asked witnesses, and I am thinking of Deputy Minister Noreau, what the consequences would be of the action taken by Canada to help producers. We asked them what the consequences would be internationally.

I do not for a moment want to denigrate the government's efforts to provide temporary relief for Canadian grain producers. However, there is an international dimension that arises from the action taken by the government.

Will this program merely add fuel to the international fire? Will the situation get worse at the international level? Will the Common Market, Australia and the United States make an already unstable situation for international prices even worse?

Of course, Mr. Noreau, the Deputy Minister, answered my question in rather general terms, but he did have a few comments.

However, I see no reference in the report to the fact that this aspect of the problem was raised in committee. I do think this is an important aspect because unless an agreement is reached at the international level, the grain price situation will continue to deteriorate. That is the crux of the problem. However, the report makes no mention of this. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I don't think the procedure suggested by Senator Argue is in accordance with the practice and rules of the Senate.

If the Senate is dissatisfied with a committee's report, it can refer the report back to committee with a request for reconsideration of some point or other that was overlooked or that was not presented the way the Senate thought it should have been.

If Senator Argue has no problem with the substance of the report, I have no objection. However, I would not want this to become a precedent.

From what was said by Senator Corbin, it is clear that in any case, when it is time to discuss the substance of the problem, we can do so when the bill is tabled.

At this point I don't think the report requires concurrence. The committee submits its report to the Senate. Whether or not we concur in the report does not change a thing. The report does not offer any specific conclusions. We are not being asked to concur or not to concur. What we have here are just comments.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): We can use it when we consider the bill.

Senator Flynn: Yes, of course, but I think that if we were to create a precedent by not objecting to the kind of amendments proposed by Senator Argue, we might have problems in the future.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn has raised a rather important point. I would like to refer honourable senators to Beauchesne's, Citation 658, second paragraph, which says:

[English]

(2) A report from a committee may not be amended in a substantive manner by the House; it must be referred back to the committee.

If we do not get unanimous consent to discuss this amendment which has been introduced by Senator Argue, would it not have to be sent back to the committee to consider the amendment and report back to the Senate? I am putting that as a question. I am looking for clarification.

Senator Argue: Your Honour, with great respect, the committee also questioned the impact of low grain prices on the market price of red meat. It was the opinion of the committee that the policy matters raised should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. That is fine. I have no objection to what is there. I am merely saying that when I was present at the committee those other three items were raised; and I would like to have them embodied in its report. The report would then read:

It was the opinion of the committee that the policy matters raised should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

It is not taking a position on those questions. It does not change the report in the sense of bringing in new or extraneous matters, because those matters were referred to in committee. I believe it was merely an oversight on the part of the officials who draft these reports that those three major items were not included. If they were included in the report, then the governing sentence would be:

It was the opinion of the committee that the policy matters raised should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Senator Frith: And you then move a motion to refer it back to the committee.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot recall a committee report being amended by the Senate. That has not happened during my time in this place. I do not think we should recommend that we start that precedent now. It would be most unfair to the committees themselves, to the people who have spent their time drafting the reports, to the people who took the time to listen to the evidence, and all others involved in the preparation of the report to simply have it amended by the Senate. If the Senate has difficulty accepting a committee report, the Senate should refer that report back to the committee and recommend that the committee re-examine the report.

I am not recommending that because I think that the report on the subject matter of this particular bill is far too important, as I gather from listening to the debates in this place and listening to the concerns of senators from the west, and, indeed, senators from all agricultural areas of Canada. The disbursement of $300 million is far more important than making an amendment to the report.

Putting all that aside, I think the subject can best be approached, if I may suggest, by simply making a reference to the Senate Committee on Agriculture concerning the problems the honourable Senator Argue has raised. Senator Argue can stand in this chamber and move a motion that the two-price wheat problem or the impact of certain provisions concerning red meat be referred to the Senate Committee on Agriculture. The Senate can get at the problem from that angle.

I dread the thought of this chamber amending a committee report that was presented in good faith and which involved a great deal of work and attention by the members of the committee. I would really be worried if we set that precedent today.

Senator Leblanc: I believe the words "policy matters" found in the report cover the point raised by Senator Corbin, as well as the three points that were raised by Senator Argue. There is no restriction in the report.

The committee met at 11 o'clock this morning and sat until 1 o'clock this afternoon. Because we were told that the bill was being brought before the Senate this afternoon, we had to be diligent, and that is what we tried to be. The report was presented in the normal fashion. I do not see why the Senate should amend the report; the report covers all of the points raised by honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, all of the comments Senator Argue made are quite in order while the Senate is taking the report into consideration. The problem is that the Senate cannot amend a committee's report. The Senate can criticize a committee report, and it would be in order for Senator Argue to say, "I believe that this report should contain the following." There is nothing wrong with Senator Argue's doing that. The problem is that the Senate cannot amend a committee report. The Senate can comment on a report, reject it, adopt it, not adopt it or make recommendations as to what it would like to see in the report, but it cannot amend the report. If the Senate wants the bill amended, it has to refer the bill back to the committee for further consideration. It is the committee's report, not the Senate's report.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, what Senator Frith has said—

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Surely Senator Argue has accomplished his purpose. He has pointed out that the policy matters be referred—

Senator Argue: I could, if you would let me speak.

Senator Godfrey: You have already spoken three or four times; I have not spoken yet, so stay in your seat and stay quiet for a minute while I say that you have served your purpose adequately. Senator Leblanc has explained that any policy matters should be referred to the committee, as did Senator Doody. I think we are wasting a great deal of time. You have accomplished your purpose.

Senator Argue: Who is wasting time now? You have accomplished your purpose; you have put your comments on the record. What is happening now is that one senator after another is rising to agree with the Speaker's interpretation of the rules. I do not have a reputation of being a rule breaker—

Senator Flynn: Nobody has criticized you.

Senator Argue: —I am quite happy to accept the practice of the Senate without being flogged by three or four senators.

Senator Frith: We are not flogging you.

Senator Argue: That's all right. The Speaker is an intelligent person. I am happy to agree, but before I can stand and agree, it has to be pounded in! But I come back to my point.

Senator Godfrey: Oh God!

Senator Argue: That's helpful! Go ahead with your dissertation from your seat.

In any event, I believe the report that is before the Senate is not as comprehensive as the discussion. I do not think it is an adequate report. I can understand that this is the day before the adjournment for the Christmas holidays; I can understand that it would be difficult and it would inconvenience the committee if the Senate amended the report. I have been here long enough to know that anyone can raise any matter on an Inquiry, and that the subject of that Inquiry can be referred to a standing committee. I know all of that.

In any event, having erred in the method I used to put this matter before the chamber, and after having been reminded by a number of senators that the rules do not allow that, including the Speaker—which was sufficient in itself to convince me—I am prepared to cease pressing the matter. The motion was not formally put; I just put it for discussion purposes.

Senator Corbin and I have made our points.

Senator Godfrey: Yes, you have.

Senator Argue: I think the draftsman—and it is not the chairman of the committee who drafts the report; we all know that—failed to put in some pertinent questions.

Senator Godfrey: You said that already!

Senator Argue: I am following the pattern set by everyone else.

Senator Godfrey: The pattern is not to repeat yourself three or four times.

Senator Argue: Just keep on talking from your seat, keep on making progress from your seat.

In any event, I have mentioned those points.

Senator Godfrey: That's right.

Senator Argue: Because of the points made by me and by Senator Corbin, I am sure that in the future the Senate Committee on Agriculture may be seized with the importance of these questions.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I will take 30 seconds; I have not made my point. The point I tried to make was that the Senate has been requested to rubber stamp a report of a committee without its being read from the Table and without senators having the text in front of them. That is what, in principle, I objected to.

Another debate took place once we received the text of the report. I for one will not stand in this place, or any place for that matter, and be asked to say "Yea" or "Nay" to a report without knowing what is in it. That is what I found offensive about the procedure this afternoon. When the Clerk rose to read the report, someone yelled, "Dispense." We did not have a text at that time. I for one did not believe we should have proceeded on the matter.

I apologize for having been 30 seconds over.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: So we are back to the Christmas mood.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-14, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.—(Honourable Senator Leblanc (Saurel)).

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I hope that I am not getting into the bad habit of rising frequently to speak in the Senate. I have been asked to reply on behalf of the Opposition to the introductory comments on Bill C-14.

I wish to congratulate the mover of this bill, the honourable Senator Duff Roblin, on his sober and brief comments in moving the second reading of Bill C-14, which is entitled:

An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

Indeed, I understand why he made such brief and sober comments. It is not much fun to sponsor a tax bill proposing taxes which Canadians will not be able to recover later on since they are indirect taxes, as we all know, because these taxes are not clearly indicated in the price of the goods we buy.

If a Canadian purchases an item worth $100, under Bill C-14, he will have to pay a minimum of $8 which will not appear on his bill, or he may have to pay $12 or $15 depending on the item.

In the case of building materials, the amount would be $8. For cablevision or pay TV services, the amount would also be $8, and the consumer never would realize it. For alcoholic beverages or tobacco, he would pay $15. For any other taxable item, and the list is too long to give here, he would pay $12, and so on.

Naturally, to these amounts would be added the direct taxes imposed by the provinces, which will automatically increase because the price of the product itself will be higher.

As I have just said, the taxes proposed in Bill C-14 apply to wines, tobacco, beer, spirits, air transport, telecommunication programming services and fuels.

Canadians generally are affected by the fuel tax. Some people in Canada are exempt, such as diplomats and farmers. However, generally, all Canadians will pay the fuel tax.

It is interesting to examine the real impact of this bill on the average taxpayer, families and individual Canadians.

[Senator Corbin.]

If we look at Bill C-14 at the same time as the data provided by the Minister of Finance last February 26 in the Budget Papers, it is easier to see the real impact of this legislation in coming years.

By 1990, Canadian taxpayers will have paid $6.1 billion in hidden sales and excise taxes. For instance, for 1986, which is not a complete taxation year, the amount will be $820 million. For 1987, it will be $1.2 billion. For 1998, $1.275 billion. For 1989, $1.35 billion, and for 1990, $1.455 billion.

When taxes increase, the purchasing power of Canadians is reduced. In my opinion, this slows down economic growth and creates a vicious circle.

No economic growth, less government revenue, so more taxes for Canadians.

This bill is supposed to be a mechanism to check and reduce the deficit. However it can also have the opposite effect, namely a higher deficit due to a stagnant economy and to the very likely increase in the inflation rate, which in turn would automatically trigger rising interest rates.

Indeed, when Canadians have less money to buy consumer goods which become ever more expensive, what kind of economic growth can we expect? All Canadians know there are two simple ways to tackle the deficit: either you cut unwarranted expenditures, or you raise taxes. It would seem that since it came into office in 1984 the Conservative government has chosen the hidden tax method, just as it took a roundabout way to raise taxes through earlier pieces of legislation.

The sponsor of the bill rightfully pointed out that the subject matter of this measure had been studied by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Wednesday, November 5, 1986. The result of this study was presented to the Senate by the chairman, Senator Ian Sinclair, in its fourth report which reads as follows:

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of the Bill C-14, intituled: "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, 30th October, 1986, examined the said subject-matter and now reports that it recommends that the said Bill, when examined by the Senate, be favourably considered.

Of course I have no intention of objecting to the report. Still I should like to refer to the recent comments of Senator Royce Frith, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, and I quote:

Honourable senators, although the Senate does have constitutional authority to turn down a government request for supply, one can hardly imagine a situation where it would do so. Even in Australia where senators do have such constitutional and, I suppose, political power, they seldom use it. The last time they did they triggered quite a crisis. Here, of course, we always grant government supply. However, certain comments . . .

. . . like those I have just made, and certain criticisms were in order. But of course I accept the fourth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

[English]

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Stanley Haidasz moved the second reading of Bill S-4, to amend the Hazardous Products Act (Tobacco and Tobacco Products).

He said: Honourable senators, I believe there are few issues in our troubled world on which concerned people speak with a unified voice. The menace of cancer is such a one. Seeking its causes, prevention and cure is the great common concern of all mankind—in Canada no less than in the farthest reaches of the world.

In the past few years Canadians have been shaken and edified by the “walks” across this vast country by two young Canadians, Terry Fox and Steve Fonyo, who each lost a leg to cancer. These two young Canadians made a contribution towards the promotion of support for researching cancer. It was a great personal commitment. By their determination and courage, they have increased the public's interest not only in cancer research but also in the support that Canadians are giving to the Canadian Cancer Society so that this fight against this horrid disease may continue. It remains a formidable challenge.

The facts and figures reveal the enormous gravity and urgency of the problem. Approximately 30 per cent of cancer deaths in Canada are caused directly by tobacco smoking, which is entirely preventable. Last year more than 32,000 Canadians died from tobacco related diseases, which include mostly lung cancer, respiratory disorders, as well as increased risk of cardio-vascular diseases.

For all their horrors, Bhopal and Chernobyl appear insignificant in comparison. Beyond the cost in human and personal terms, the economic costs to Canada are also staggering. A spokesman for the Canadian Cancer Society stated recently that employers are paying an extra $1,500 to $3,000 a year for each worker they allow to smoke on the job. Productivity is greatly reduced. Smokers are 50 per cent more likely to need health care than nonsmokers, and, furthermore, National Health and Welfare statisticians in Canada have stated recently that in 1982 tobacco smoking cost the Canadian economy $7.1 billion—and that was four years ago.

This enormous direct cost to our economy was broken down into $4.5 billion in lost income due to premature deaths; $1.5 billion due to hospitalization costs; $860 million due to disability payments; $30 million due to physician care, and $120 million due to fire loss. I should also add that these figures did not include extra pharmaceutical costs at home, firefighting services and the purchase as well as the maintenance of ventilation systems. All this human tragedy and economic loss was caused by a single factor: tobacco smoking. What is really astounding is the fact that all this annual loss is preventable!

These statistics are mind boggling, but apparently many Canadians have grown numb to them—largely, I believe, as a result of the advertising techniques of tobacco manufacturers. Smokers have grown accustomed to seeing tobacco portrayed in magazine advertisements as socially acceptable and even healthful. They have been led to believe that smoking brings success, slimness, glamour, strength and independence. But, honourable senators, they have been misled. They have been harmed, enslaved to a dangerous habit, addicted to nicotine, which is often equal to the addiction of heroin. Figuratively, literally and prematurely, these smokers have become a very sad picture in our society. All these human and financial resources could have been put to productive use. They could have contributed enormous savings to our security and health care costs; they could have increased the quality of life in our country. Instead, we are faced with a great tragedy.

Honourable senators, I believe that it is a national scandal that our governments—federal and provincial—tolerate this waste—yes, even permit it to happen by allowing unregulated production, advertising, promotion and sale of a hazardous and totally unnecessary product. What a grave indictment of governments that fail to bring in effective legislation to prevent this enormous loss of lives and money. I ask: Is it apathy? Is it fear of the tobacco lobby, or votes, or greed, or is it due to all of these? I must, however, congratulate the Government of Quebec, which yesterday announced measures to ban tobacco smoking in public places, including hockey arenas. I appreciate also the efforts of municipal governments like those in Toronto and Vancouver who have enacted bylaws to provide smoke-free areas in public places such as restaurants.

Honourable senators, some years ago Sir George Young, Assistant Undersecretary of Health in Great Britain, stated the following:

The solution of many of today's medical problems will not be found in the research laboratories of our hospitals and universities, but in our Parliaments. For the prospective patient, the answer may not be cure by incision at the operating table, but prevention by decision at the cabinet table—

Earlier this year, precisely on May 6, my fellow members and colleagues of the newly-formed advocacy group named “Physicians For A Smoke-Free Canada” took the initiative of filing an application under the Hazardous Products Act, petitioning the federal Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to declare tobacco a hazardous product and to phase in a total ban on advertising of tobacco products. Unfortunately, that minister and his successor have not taken any action, choosing rather to abdicate their responsibility and throwing this hot issue into the lap of the Minister of National Health and Welfare who, though well-intentioned, is apparently having a difficult time bringing in effective measures against tobacco smoking.

Unfortunately for Canadians, the indecision at the federal and nine provincial cabinet tables is forcing concerned citizens and anti-smoking advocacy groups to speak out, to demand and even to act against tobacco smoking.

It is in response to this need, this challenge, that I introduced again this session a bill to deal with this problem. As the problem of tobacco related diseases is multi-faceted and complex, several approaches are necessary. I believe that a comprehensive and total attack all at one time would be overwhelming—a pill too big and too bitter to swallow.

I will be re-introducing next month my bill, S-8, of the last session, in amended form, to protect the rights of non-smokers by regulating tobacco smoking in the federal work place and on modes of transportation under federal jurisdiction. Today I am pleased to open the debate on second reading of Bill S-4, which I introduced on November 6.

Bill S-4 is simple, clear and short, containing only two clauses. Specifically, Bill S-4 contains amendments to the Hazardous Products Act, declaring tobacco and all tobacco products to be hazardous substances and banning their advertising and promotion. The bill accomplishes this purpose in the following manner:

Subsection 3(2) of the Hazardous Products Act reads:

No person shall advertise, sell or import into Canada a hazardous product included in Part II of the Schedule except as authorized by the regulations.

● (1610)

This section prohibits the advertising of a hazardous product included in Part II of the Schedule to the act, but, at the same time, it allows the Governor in Council to authorize exceptions to the prohibition by making regulations to that effect.

Thus, the simple addition of tobacco and tobacco products to the list of hazardous products included in Part II of the Schedule to the act would not result in a ban on the advertising of tobacco. In order to achieve such a ban, it is necessary to remove the power of the Governor in Council to make exceptions. That is why clause 1 of Bill S-4 contains an amendment to the regulation-making authority of the Governor in Council. It provides that with respect to the sale or importation of tobacco and tobacco products, regulatory exceptions can be made, but no such exceptions can be made with respect to their advertising. As a result, the bill will not prohibit the sale or importation of tobacco or tobacco products. It will only prohibit their advertising.

In summary, by adding tobacco and tobacco products to the list of hazardous products contained in Part II of the Hazardous Products Act, and at the same time removing from the Governor in Council the power to make exceptions to the advertising prohibition, a complete ban on the advertising of tobacco and tobacco products is therefore achieved.

This result is achieved because section 3 of the Hazardous Products Act, which is the operative section or, if you will, the nucleus of the act, prohibits the advertising, sale or importation into Canada of these products

Section 3 of the Hazardous Products Act also contains an offence provision. If Bill S-4 becomes law, anyone who violates section 3 by advertising cigarettes or other tobacco products would be liable on summary conviction to a fine of $1,000 or to imprisonment for six months or to both. The person would also be liable, if the Crown decided to prosecute the offence as an indictable offence, to imprisonment for two years.

Under the Hazardous Products Act, "advertise" includes "any representation by any means whatever for the purpose of promoting directly or indirectly the sale or other disposition of a hazardous product."

Although the tobacco industry agreed to a voluntary code on advertising in 1972, it continues to advertise heavily in stores near schools and encourages large displays of tobacco products at the checkout and cash counters of retail stores, even in pharmacies.

Partial bans are subject to evasion, especially if the tobacco industry is allowed to sponsor sports and cultural events. It is estimated that the tobacco industry spends $100 million to $200 million on advertising in Canada and $2 billion in the U.S.A. However, this should not intimidate us but should actually encourage us to legislate the banning of the advertising of tobacco products.

Efforts to control tobacco advertising are becoming increasingly common as a means of counteracting the power and pervasiveness of the tobacco industry's marketing techniques. Among 64 countries known to have national legislation to restrict smoking as of 1982, 54 countries enacted controls on advertising. Total bans on advertising have been enacted in countries such as Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Singapore, Spain, Poland, Bulgaria and the U.S.S.R. Of course, the efficacy of a total ban in a given country varies with differences in legal systems, the thoroughness of the enforcement agencies and the influence of foreign media that are not subject to the ban.

Honourable senators, I believe that what we can do now to tackle the problem of tobacco smoking is to begin by banning the advertising and promotion of tobacco products by passing Bill S-4.

The World Health Organization as well as the Canadian Non-smoker's Rights Association, the Canadian Council on Smoking and Health, the Canadian Medical Association and the Canadian Cancer Society have called for a total ban on tobacco advertising. Groups such as Physicians for a Smoke-Free Society not only want a ban on advertising but also want tobacco declared a hazardous substance.

Canadian newspapers such as the Toronto Globe and Mail, the Kingston Whig-Standard and the Brockville Recorder have already refused to accept advertisements of tobacco products. Two of those newspapers have banned smoking in their general work areas. They are convinced, as I am and as I believe all of us here should be, that there exists a compelling government and public interest that tobacco be declared a hazardous product and that its advertising and promotion should be banned.

Numerous scientific and epidemiological articles have been published implicating active tobacco smoking and even passive smoking as well as the use of smokeless tobacco products as causative factors in bronchogenic carcinoma, respiratory diseases such as emphysema and chronic obstructive pulmonary disease, as well as being an increasing risk factor in cardiovascular diseases. Consequently, society and government have a deep interest in this matter.

I urge honourable senators to become interested in the issue of tobacco smoking, to express their views in this chamber on Bill S-4, to make their contributions by stating their views in committee and, I hope, to pass it as soon as possible.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Haidasz a question.

If we give this bill second reading now, would it be his intention to move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology before third reading?

Senator Haidasz: Yes, I would be most agreeable and, frankly, grateful if the committee studied the bill.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I think this measure before the chamber is too important to pass so very rapidly, even though I think it is desirable and I am in favour of it.

Therefore, if no one else wishes to do so, I move the adjournment of the debate. This is not to prolong dealing with the issue, but I am of the belief that a well-aired debate in the Senate and then to have the bill referred to committee would be the best way to proceed.

On motion of Senator Argue, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX ACT AND RELATED ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Jacques Flynn moved the second reading of Bill C-23, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act and a Related Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the job faced by the sponsor of a bill to amend the Income Tax Act is not a very fascinating exercise. Neither is it the occasion for a very pleasant speech, unless he speaks to something other than the legislation. I might perhaps refer to the budget or to this government's general policies. This would be more provocative, because reciting the contents of this kind of bill is a tedious rather than invigorating exercise.

However, Bill C-23 is nonetheless an important measure because it involves amendments to the Income Tax Act that were announced in the budget brought down on February 26, 1986.

As usual, the legislation comes very late to the Senate. The more things change, the more they remain the same, or should I say the worse they get, according to one's vantage point.

These amendments are largely the result of a very extensive consultation process that started before the February budget was delivered. It went on until the notice of the Ways and Means Motion was tabled for the bill on October 31, 1986.

The government is giving increasing priority to the consultation process because representations from taxpayers, professionals and spokesmen for the various sectors of the Canadian society are an invaluable contribution to the decision-making process. Such a contribution helps the government find better answers to our problems.

On May 23, 1985, the Minister of Finance issued a document entitled: "The Corporate Income Tax System, a Direction for Change". After having held consultations on the matter, the minister is proposing changes that would improve the corporate income tax system by suppressing tax incentives that benefit some companies and reducing the tax rate for all corporations.

That reduction in the corporate tax rate, which could only be brought about by extending the corporate tax base by way of eliminating, as I said, some tax incentives will be followed by other steps in the reform of the corporate income tax system.

The following changes are proposed in Bill C-23—10 and 7 per cent investment tax credit—rather, those tax credits will be phased out by the end of 1988. Second, the 3 per cent deduction for inventory is eliminated as of February 26, 1986. Third, over the next three years, the business income tax rates will be significantly reduced. The small business tax rate will be reduced from 15 to 13 per cent, the tax rate for small manufacturing businesses will be reduced to 8 per cent, the large business tax rate will be reduced from 36 to 33 per cent and the tax rate for large manufacturing concerns will further be reduced to 26 per cent.

Those changes are aimed at reducing economic distortions caused by business decisions being unduly influenced by tax factors rather than sound business criteria.

This legislation is not limited to reforming the corporate income tax system. It also includes major provisions for improving tax fairness, since it will implement the minimum income tax, restrict the ability of employees to secure windfall tax benefits through arrangements for delayed salary payment; it will also implement new rules on the risk fraction in the case of limited partnerships, and rules for the use of income tax credits by trust companies so investors can not derive from the tax system disproportionate benefits in relation to their investments.

Moreover, Bill C-23 will implement the first stage of the pension reform by increasing the maximum deductible RRSP contribution for tax years 1986 and 1987 from $5,500 to $7,500.

On October 9, the Minister of Finance tabled in Parliament a document showing the highlights of a new and better retirement pension system. In this document, he explained how the annual ceiling will rise to $9,500 in 1988, and then by $2,000 each year up to $15,500 in 1991.

Bill C-23 introduces a number of significant changes to Registered Retirement Income Funds, or RRIFs, so that those funds may actually become a more useful instrument for withdrawing funds accumulated in an RRSP.

Here are these changes: The ceiling for annual contributions to an RRIF will be eliminated. The RRIF ceiling per person will also be eliminated. Contributions to an RRIF could start at any time after it has been registered instead of only after the start of the following calendar year. It will also no longer be forbidden to redeem life or temporary annuities payable under an RRIF.

This bill introduces a new federal sales tax refundable tax credit aiming at relieving low income Canadians from part of the burden of federal sales tax.

When he dealt yesterday with the bill amending the Excise Tax Act, Senator Roblin mentioned this corrective measure which will remedy the distortion resulting from certain taxes hurting unfairly and inequitably the most disadvantaged. This credit will generally be offered to every family with an income of $15,000 or less. Such a family will become entitled to $50 per adult and $25 per child under 18. The fact that this tax credit is refundable will ensure that families paying little or no federal income tax will nevertheless benefit fully from that credit. A federal sales tax credit is a significant element of a fair tax system.

In the same context of helping the most needy, I should mention Bill C-11 which we adopted a while ago and which, now implemented, has permitted the advance payment of the Child Tax Credit to be paid out.

Another proposal stemming from the February budget was the increase in the deduction for the handicapped. Beginning in 1986, this deduction will increase by $250 for 1986 and will reach $2,850.

Bill C-23 will implement that budget measure and also improve the formula for establishing the entitlement to this deduction.

Bill C-23 includes other provisions aimed at eliminating obstacles to growth.

For example, the new flow-through share provision concerning the mining industry which makes it possible for investors to buy these shares without being concerned about third-party liability in case of incidents occurring during the exploration or development stage.

Another example is the widening of exemption in the case of tax deduction for non-residents, in order to make it possible for Canadian corporations to go to foreign financial markets and reduce their borrowing cost on international markets.

The bill also contains important measures for regional development, one of these being the improved investment tax credit for Cape Breton. Thus the minimum investment in amortizable assets required in the case of an eligible project is reduced from $50,000 to $25,000, so smaller projects will now be eligible for this credit.

Another change made in the bill and concerning this credit has to do with an increase—from 20 to 40 per cent for major corporations—in the unused portion of such Cape Breton refundable investment tax credits earned in a given year. Before this change, only small businesses were eligible for the 40 per cent refund.

Another measure in this bill important for regional development is the special housing deduction and the deduction for travelling expenses for medical or leisure purposes incurred by people who live in Arctic and other remote regions. This measure will increase the tax deductions now allowed to these people through remission orders. It will become a more permanent benefit since it will be specifically authorized under the Income Tax Act.

Honourable senators know that the tax system contains a wide variety of measures designed for small businesses. The present definition of small business requires the company to use most of its assets in active operations in Canada. This definition has been a stumbling block for Canadian businessmen anxious to expand in foreign countries. If we expect Canadian companies to operate profitably throughout the world, we must eliminate this kind of obstacle.

This is why Bill C-23 broadens the definition of small business so as to include companies which use most of their assets in an active company which operates mainly in Canada.

[English]

Honourable senators, what I have said summarizes the contents of the bill. I would like to draw to the attention of honourable senators the fact that we have had a report from the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee on the subject matter of this bill. That report appears in Tuesday's Hansard at page 314. The report indicates that the committee has heard witnesses on two occasions, namely, Wednesday December 3 and Thursday December 4. The report deals with some of the issues found in the bill, for example, the alternative minimum tax—and there are some observations in the report that might be of interest to honourable senators—and whether or not this minimum tax will always be equitable. I suppose that we have to experiment with what is really a new tax before we can pass final judgment on its effectiveness and its equitableness.

● (1630)

The report also deals with changes to RRSP contributions, and mentions submissions made by the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association and the Life Underwriters Association of Canada, both of whom are critical of the fact that you can withdraw your contributions without buying an annuity. The committee comes to the conclusion that there are some fundamental differences between RRSPs and sponsored pension plans. The report also deals with the submissions of the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada regarding the provisions of the bill touching on flow-through shares. This is a technical problem and I will leave it to honourable senators interested in the subject to read what is in the report on the matter. Finally, the committee deals with the surtax on individuals and corporations. Of course, increasing taxes is never a very popular measure. On this subject the report reads:

In order to reduce the federal deficit, the bill proposes a surtax of 3 per cent on the basic federal tax of individuals beginning on 1st July, 1986 . . . and 3 per cent surtax on Federal Income Tax payable by all corporations beginning 1st January, 1987—

The report notes that the bill does not include a termination date for these taxes, but that the minister has announced his intention to continue the surtax until he has reformed the federal sales tax. I believe that the objective is to keep this tax in place for only a few years.

Because of some provisions in the bill that are applicable to the present fiscal year, namely, those with regard to RRSP contributions, there is some urgency in passing this bill. I suggest that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has done a thorough job on the subject matter of the bill and that it might not be necessary to refer the bill itself to that committee. However, I leave that decision to honourable senators. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, we are always put in the position that having pre-studied a bill, we must then proceed through the three readings of the bill in a very short time. But I do not suppose there is much that we can do about it.

Senator Frith: We have yet to discover what it is we can do about it.

Senator Flynn: Yes, we have been searching for a solution, but have not really found a good one. In any event, I commend the bill and recommend that it be given favourable treatment by the Senate.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I would like to congratulate Senator Flynn on his exposition. I sat in on the hearings of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee on the subject matter of this bill, and the honourable senator has explained clearly and fairly all of its provisions.

I would like to make a comment on this process of pre-studying bills. Out of curiosity, I looked back to February 23, 1982 when I wrote a letter to the then Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Honourable Raymond Perrault, suggesting that this principle of pre-study, which had been adopted by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee for many years, had not really been adopted by other committees of the Senate. I can recall that at the time there were complaints about what was called "Christmas closure". Senators were complaining that they did not have time to consider the bills or even to send them to committee. Of course, the obvious solution was to pre-study the bills, and that is what we have been doing. I do not think that I have heard one complaint about being rushed or about not having a chance to pre-study those bills which deserve to be pre-studied.

I would like to make three comments on matters that were discussed in the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. The first is in connection with the Alternative Minimum Tax to which Senator Flynn referred. The Senate committee, in its report, said:

3) There may be inequitable application of the AMT in some instances on the death of a taxpayer. There is provision for a three-year carryback provision that will allow the AMT on death to be applied to the excess, if any, of regular Part I tax or AMT for the three preceding years.

It goes on to say:

. . . the three-year relief may be of little help to taxpayers who have never paid much regular Part I tax because of low income. This may impact on farmers in particular who have paid little Part I tax during their lifetimes and may incur a very large AMT when they die, owing to the inclusion of the untaxed capital gain net of the capital gain exemption claimed on the deemed disposition of their farms at death. This is of concern to the committee and the Department of Finance officials have indicated that they are studying means of providing relief.

I was supplied with a briefing kit by the Research Bureau of the national Liberal caucus, which contains the following comment:

In the February 1986 budget, the minister announced an important change with respect to the original proposal. He announced that capital gains and the gross-up on taxable dividends will be excluded from the computation of the minimum tax. In other words, only the actual amount of taxable dividends are to be included in income.

This is an important change because the amount of tax that the government expected to collect, as well as the number of tax-filers affected, will be greatly reduced compared to the initial proposal. When it was first announced, the Minister of Finance estimated that approximately 100,000 tax-filers would be required to complete two tax returns; that 54,000 would be required to pay a minimum tax, and that the measure would generate approximately $300 million. What this single change does is cut the figures in half: 50,000 tax-filers will be required to complete two returns, 25,000 tax-filers will in fact be required to pay a minimum tax and the tax will bring in $150 million.

The $150 million in question is probably refundable. Although I attended the meetings, I was not present at the drafting of the report; nor was I present when this question was being discussed. I wish to say that what is in that briefing kit does not really gibe with what is in the Senate committee's report, because the briefing kit says that the capital gains tax is not included. I would therefore ask Senator Flynn whether he could possibly get some information from the department to clarify what may seem to be a contradiction, but which may very well not be.

My next point concerns registered retirement savings plans, referred to in the committee's report. The report says:

Both the CLHIA—

That is, the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association.

—and the Life Underwriters Association of Canada (LUAC) object to the proposal that individuals be entitled to commute their RRSP annuities and RRIFs. They argue that members of private pension plans and the Canada and Quebec pension plans are not allowed to withdraw their savings.

At that point I should read in one other paragraph of a letter which the association sent to the committee, in which it said:

We believe that allowing owners of registered retired savings plans to cash out their incomes after retirement removes from all RRSPs the last vestige of obligations that are imposed on pension plans. It turns them into simply tax shelters for personal savings and away from the original intent that they be personal pension plans.

I can well recall that when RRSPs were first introduced I had a personal interest because I was mixed up with the mutual fund business. We thought this was a great opportunity to sell mutual funds through the use of registered retirement savings plans. It was very simple. Previously, if you were a lawyer, a doctor or a chartered accountant, you could not get a pension plan, and this was put in to permit this for the self-employed.

So I fail to see the distinction. The original purpose was to permit pension plans for self-employed people.

The report of the committee says:

The Committee notes that there are some fundamental differences between RRSPs and company sponsored pension plans. RRSPs are plans entered into voluntarily by individuals with voluntary contributions up to maximum limits. Company sponsored pension plans are usually compulsory as a condition of employment.

Further on the report says:

Having made contributions to a voluntary plan, individuals would be entitled to commute should their circumstances change . . . The purpose of the legislation is to give people the right to make their own decisions rather than being forced by legislation to remain committed to receive annuity payments in circumstances which may not be appropriate.

Personally I cannot see the relevance, and I expressed that view in committee. Although I was not present at the drafting of the report, the committee knew my views; but I was overridden. I do not really see the relevance, that just because RRSPs are voluntary, people should be allowed to draw money out, when one cannot do that so far as pension plans are concerned. That may be a little paternalistic. Someone who holds an RRSP—I certainly had one myself—would quite naturally like to be able to do this; but the government, in its wisdom, has said, "You cannot do it with regard to pension plans," and I cannot see why people should be permitted to do it with regard to registered retirement savings plans.

The report refers to the "Surtax on Individuals and Corporations". I should like to point out for the record the cumulative effect, so far as individuals are concerned, on increased taxes, and I would like to give some figures with respect to a one-earner couple with two children. If the income is $15,000 per year, they pay $255 extra tax because of this. If the income is $30,000 per year, they pay $630 extra tax; and if the income is $50,000 per year, they pay only $575 extra tax. It seems to be a very curious anomaly, that persons who make $50,000 per year have less of an increase than those making $30,000 per year.

I wish also to refer to the Refundable Federal Sales Tax Credit, to which Senator Flynn also referred. In the briefing kit it says:

The level of income about which the credit is no longer refundable is too low. The $15,000 level is below the poverty line, which, for a family of four living in a city is approximately $21,000. According to estimates, if the government decided to raise the income limit to $21,000—

Which is the poverty line.

—(instead of $15,000), the measure would cost $150 million more in 1986 (raising the cost from $330 million to $480 million).

The amount of the credit is insufficient to compensate fully for the federal sales tax. A family of four is estimated to pay an average of $445 per year in federal sales tax alone. According to the government's proposal, the same family would receive $150 credit ($50 per adult and $25 per child). Hence the credit would have to be three times as large as what the government proposes to fully compensate families for the sales tax. The federal sales tax rate now stands at 12% and the government has increased it by three percentage points since taking power.

I suppose that, in fact, the refundable sales tax credit is intended to take care of the increase rather than the whole.

My final point concerns the dividend tax credit. The bill proposes that the dividend gross-up be reduced from 50 per cent to 33 1/3 per cent, and the dividend tax credit be reduced from 22 2/3 per cent of taxable income to 16 2/3 per cent. These changes will increase the taxes paid by individuals, as far as their owning of common shares securities are concerned.

I find that a little contradictory, the fact that they are discouraging by reducing the investment in common shares when a year and a half ago they were trying to encourage investment by eliminating capital gains tax for the first $500,000.

Those are all of the comments that I wish to make. I agree with Senator Flynn that there is no point in sending this back to committee.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: May I inform honourable senators that if Senator Flynn speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Godfrey for his comments and contributions.

● (1650)

I may say that absolute equity in matters of taxation is an impossible goal, but we have to try and try again. I do not suggest there is absolute logic in all fiscal decisions that are made by governments from time to time. If the government does not get a result by a given measure, sometimes it has to try something else. It may be that this happened to the Minister of Finance. I do not think he achieved the exact results he had hoped for in his first budget and he therefore had to realign his forces and his objectives.

With regard to the points made by Senator Godfrey concerning the Alternative Minimum Tax, the report of the committee states:

There may be inequitable application of the AMT in some instances on the death of a taxpayer.

That may be the problem. We are not certain that that will be the situation, and I do not think that the information the committee received is erroneous, on the contrary, but it may be in the case of the death of a taxpayer because of the deemed realization of all of the assets in the taxpayer's estate. But for the ordinary taxpayer the Alternative Minimum Tax is calculated, as the report states:

by readjusting taxable income to add back various tax preferences—

It may be that when we speak of "various tax preferences" we do not speak of capital gains. However, I will undertake to obtain an official reply on this for Senator Godfrey.

Senator Godfrey gave his opinion on the changes brought to the RRSP contributions. To my way of thinking, they are not the same. I think the committee was right in saying they were not the same. They may be partly the same in the sense that they would say to a taxpayer who is not forced to contribute to a registered pension plan, "You can put aside some money, and you can put aside more if you are not contributing to a pension plan." But Senator Godfrey will acknowledge that a taxpayer may be contributing to a registered pension plan, as we do in the Senate, and then be permitted to make contributions to an RRSP.

Therefore, in this case it is voluntary. That you have more flexible rules as to the use of these funds when you reach the age of 71 is not necessarily a bad thing. The life insurance companies, of course, would rather force everybody to buy an annuity, and I can understand that. However, the official reasons given for the changes are still valid.

That is all I will put on the record at this time. I will try to obtain an official reply on the question of the Alternative Minimum Tax versus capital gains exemptions.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Translation]

On motion of Senator Flynn, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CANADAIR LIMITED DIVESTITURE AUTHORIZATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Martial Asselin moved second reading of Bill C-25, to authorize the divestiture of Canadair Limited and to provide for other matters in connection therewith.

He said: Honourable senators, in the early eighties, after having owned the company for more than five years, the government decided to proceed with the financial restructuring of the corporation. It invested substantial sums of money in the company in order to bolster its weak finances and try to save a considerable number of jobs. Honourable senators will remember this was done at considerable cost to the Canadian taxpayer, but it only treated the symptoms. Much more was needed to deal with all the problems besetting the company. It was far from making a profit. However, the government's investments helped to bolster the company's failing finances and thus saved quite a few jobs. More was needed, however.

When this government decided to sell Canadair to Bombardier, it was acting on the principle of maximizing the socio-economic benefits to the entire country and not simply maximizing the selling price. Those were the terms used by the minister, the Honourable Barbara McDougall, in her speech to the House when she introduced this bill.

The government's objective is to obtain maximum economic benefits for the country and to do so, it was not just a matter of maximizing the selling price, as the minister said, because it had become impossible to recover the billions of dollars invested previously in Canadair. It was necessary to select a company that was in the best position to give this enterprise the economic boost that would make it competitive on international markets, in a steadily expanding aerospace industry. As we all know, the sale of Canadair was entrusted to the Canada Development Investment Corporation, which co-ordinated the marketing and financial analysis necessary before recommending to the government a prospective purchaser for Canadair. The search for appropriate buyers was based on sound business principles. The criteria for evaluation apparently included the following characteristics: proven managerial, technological, marketing and manufacturing capabilities; established financial depth; and industry experience.

The minister added the following:

The CDIC's objective was to select buyers who would develop the assets of a competitive aerospace enterprise with a view to the export market, further develop aerospace technology in Canada, maintain employment prospects in Canada and support regional development priorities.

The last step in the privatization process took place early in 1986, and on February 6, there were six corporations interested in buying Canadair. They included Bombardier Inc., Canadian Aerospace Corporation, Canadian Aerospace Technologies Ltd., a consortium led by Fleet Aerospace Corporation, IMP Ltd. and Magna International Inc. Bids were invited from these parties. A team of financial advisers retained by the CDIC examined the various bids from the companies that had been asked to send in bids, and after a lengthy, difficult and detailed examination, the CDIC recommended that the government accept Bombardier's offer.

On August 18, together with her colleagues, the minister, accompanied by Minister Michel Côté, Robert de Cotret of Treasury Board and Marcel Masse of Energy, Mines and Resources, announced the signing of the letter of intent to sell Canadair to Bombardier.

[English]

TERMS OF SALE TO BOMBARDIER

A. Consideration and payment

Cash - $120 million payable at closing.

Shares - $100 million of special "A" shares issued to Bombardier to ensure that Canadair's existing working capital will be used solely for the business purposes of Canadair. Bombardier can redeem these shares by making expenditures in permitted investments related to Canadair's operations.

- $50 million of special "B" shares which can be 'earned out' by Canadair if it achieves specified increases in exports, import replacement, sales of new products, and spending on R & D.

Royalties - $173 million estimated nominal value of royalties over the next twenty years in consideration of the exclusive use of the Challenger technology. CDIC will retain responsibility for existing royalty commitments relating to the Challenger technology. Taking these into account reduces estimated net royalties to $107 million. In the first two years following closing, the Crown shall have the option of receiving a lump sum payment of $20 million in lieu of royalties.

- 1% of Canadair's share of the program revenues from the CF-18 systems engineering support contract.

Additional payments - $3 million in dividends at closing.

- $6.5 million for purchase of the Cartierville airport.

B. Other provisions

Canadair shall remain in Quebec and maintain capacity to design, develop and produce existing Canadair products. Production outside Canada will be allowed only with the prior approval of the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion.

The government shall warrant that the Canadair pension plans will be fully funded at closing. Amounts in these plans will be for the sole benefit of the Canadair employees.

CDIC will retain ownership of the Challenger technology, but will licence it exclusively to Canadair. This arrangement will make royalty payments tax deductible.

The government shall undertake to provide the necessary financing through the Export Development Corporation to enable Canadair to make Challenger sales in export markets. This commitment is contingent on Canadair's undertaking to reach the Canadian content requirements of EDC "over a specified period of time so far as it is practicable to do so".

If at any time for fifteen years after closing insurance coverage for product related injury is unavailable or is "economically impracticable to procure", then the government will share the risks of claims against Canadair to the extent of 90% during the first five years, 60% over the following five years, and 30% in the final five years.

The government shall indemnify Bombardier and Canadair for any net losses from claims against Canadair outstanding at closing or that may arise within five years of closing with respect to events that occurred prior to closing. In addition, the government shall pay for any claims exceeding insurance incurred within four years from closing and attributable to defects in a Canadair product or design made prior to closing.

[Translation]

It is to be noted that the terms of the sale refer to certain matters concerning mainly the employees. In fact, it was agreed that all Canadair employees would be offered participation in the share purchasing scheme already in place for the Bombardier employees. The government therefore is pleased to see that the employees want to share in the ownership of the company through share purchases, and that they want to be involved in the decisions concerning Canadair's future. Bombardier is committed to keeping in Quebec Canadair's manufacturing operations and its headquarters. Bombardier has also agreed to propose a plan to increase the Canadian content of the program for new technology production. In short, as indicated by the minister, the purchase of Canadair by Bombardier allows the merger of Canadian technology, a qualified work force, supported by Bombardier's managerial expertise and its experience of international markets.

When Laurent Beaudoin, Chairman of the Board and Chief Executive Officer of Bombardier Inc., appeared before the Senate committee, he briefly described Bombardier's operations by saying in part:

As you know, Bombardier is a Canadian-owned company established in Quebec more than 50 years ago. Although it is Canadian, Bombardier is a company with an international vocation. Its design, development and manufacturing operations involve a broad range of products, all related to transportation, and are carried out mainly in Canada but also in the United States, Austria and Belgium. We market our products and equipment, which are often complex, to an international clientele that is very sophisticated and very demanding.

Bombardier today is recognized as one of the leading world manufacturers of rapid transit equipment and also ranks among the main North-American manufacturers of diesel engines, while maintaining its position as the leader in the snowmobile industry, and assuming an increasingly greater role as a supplier of logistic vehicles to the military.

Bombardier now employs some 8,000 people and operates 14 plants. Its total turnover exceeds $850 million and its products are exported to 50 countries, over five continents.

In short, honourable senators, the sale of Canadair to Bombardier will allow the merging of a Canadian technology with a qualified labour force, supported by the administrative expertise of Bombardier and its knowledge of international markets. We believe that the privatization of Canadair will benefit, not only the aerospace industry itself, but also the development of new modern technologies which will serve the best interests of Canadians. It has been said many times that Canada is made up of various regions with diverse economies and economic outlooks; it is not possible, when deals of this dimension are made, to please all the regions of this country which aspire to participate in the economic development of Canada.

In such difficult contexts, when governments must make a choice, it is recognized that it is not possible in a country as widely diversified as Canada to reach unanimity. Governments must clearly base their decisions on a reasonable consensus, and that is what the government thinks it has achieved by deciding to sell Canadair to Bombardier.

Honourable senators, this bill has already been seriously considered in committee. We obtained the report this afternoon. I therefore recommend that we should accept the principle of this bill.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, first of all, I want to congratulate Senator Asselin for handling that Canadair Challenger jet in such a nice manner. He took off safely, flew high and smoothly and he landed with just a few bumps. So that overall, I think that this side of the chamber is quite pleased with the presentation that he has made; we are ready to give him his pilot's licence. Most of us who have studied this in some detail think that, for a change, the government has come up with not a bad deal. So, you will not hear too much from me at this late hour—I am sorry that I have to keep you for a few more minutes.

Interestingly enough, I read a column by Don McGillivray, who is a columnist with the Montreal Gazette. He said that:

By deciding, at least conditionally, to sell Canadair to Bombardier, the Mulroney government seems at last to have done something sensible without messing it up.

Senator Flynn, did you hear that? I thought I might get a response from you.

Senator Flynn: No; I did not.

An Hon. Senator: Repeat it. Read it again.

Senator Frith: It is not the kind of thing that usually gets by you, Senator Flynn.

Senator Buckwold: In any case, since we now have a "Minister of Privatization", which I think is certainly a new one—first we had a minister of privies, privates—I really do not know—but when we get into "privatization," I do not know of a country in the world that has a Minister of State for Privatization. It does say something of what may be yet to come.

Some of the deals have been not so good; some of them haven't quite materialized. In giving you some compliments on this deal, I think the minister has to take credit for doing her homework, for thoroughly preparing the kind of study that goes on, the negotiations, and, finally, picking a very good company to take over this very important industry, Canadair—one that means a great deal to the Canadian community, and one that keeps our image high in the aerospace industry—an industry that we really cannot let die. This is one of the reasons that on both sides of the house we feel some relief that at least a first-class company with that great reputation of Bombardier is taking over this very important industry.

I have to qualify all of this by saying that I do not think the Minister of Privatization should become too enthusiastic. She will not get such a warm response if she starts in on CBC, Air Canada and some of these other plans that we keep reading of in the paper—or even Petro-Canada.

Senator Phillips: Or privatization of the Senate!
